Lancelets ('amphioxus') are the modern survivors of an ancient chordate lineage, with a fossil record dating back to the Cambrian period. Here we describe the structure and gene content of the highly polymorphic ~520-megabase genome of the Florida lancelet Branchiostoma floridae, and analyse it in the context of chordate evolution. Whole-genome comparisons illuminate the murky relationships among the three chordate groups (tunicates, lancelets and vertebrates), and allow not only reconstruction of the gene complement of the last common chordate ancestor but also partial reconstruction of its genomic organization, as well as a description of two genome-wide duplications and subsequent reorganizations in the vertebrate lineage. These genome-scale events shaped the vertebrate genome and provided additional genetic variation for exploitation during vertebrate evolution.

Lancelets, or amphioxus, are small worm-like marine animals that spend most of their lives buried in the sea floor, filter-feeding through jawless, ciliated mouths. The vertebrate affinities of these modest creatures were first noted in the early part of the nineteenth century[1,2], and were further clarified by the embryologist Alexander Kowalevsky[3]. In particular, Kowalevsky observed that, unlike other invertebrates, amphioxus shares key anatomical and developmental features with vertebrates and tunicates (also known as urochordates). These include a hollow dorsal neural tube, a notochord, a perforated pharyngeal region, a segmented body musculature (embryologically derived from somites) and a post-anal tail. Together, the vertebrates, urochordates and lancelets (also known as cephalochordates) constitute the phylum Chordata, descended from a last common ancestor that lived perhaps 550 million years ago.

Although Kowalevsky, Darwin and others recognized the evolutionary relationship between chordate groups, the greater morphological, physiological and neural complexity of vertebrates posed a puzzle: how did the chordate ancestor—presumably a simple creature that resembled a modern amphioxus or ascidian larva—make such a transition?

Perhaps the most prevalent hypothesis for the origins of vertebrate complexity is founded on the ideas of Susumu Ohno (1970)[4], who proposed that vertebrate genomes were shaped by a series of ancient genome-wide duplications. In Ohno's original proposal, lancelet and vertebrates genomes were enlarged relative to the basic invertebrate complement by one or two rounds of genome doubling, although subsequent work suggested that these events occurred on the vertebrate stem after divergence of the lancelet lineage[5,6].

Although the sequencing of the human and other vertebrate genomes has shown that the gene number in vertebrates is comparable to, or only modestly greater than, that of invertebrates[7,8], evidence for large-scale segmental or whole-genome duplications on the vertebrate stem has mounted, with the parallel realization that most gene duplicates from such events are rapidly lost (reviewed in ref. 9). The relatively few surviving gene duplicates from the vertebrate stem provide evidence for ancient paralogous relationships between groups of human chromosomes[10–14] that plausibly arose from multiple rounds of whole-genome duplication before the emergence of modern vertebrates. However, the number, the timing and even the genomic scale of the duplication events, and their consequences for subsequent genome evolution, are poorly understood (for a review, see ref. 15), in part because the tunicate genomes are highly rearranged relative to the unduplicated early chordate karyotype (see below).

The Florida lancelet B. floridae (the generic name Branchiostoma refers to the characteristic perforated branchial arches) provides a critical point of reference for these studies[16]. This species and its relatives (collectively also known as amphioxus, derived from the Greek amphi+oxys, 'sharp at both ends') are widely regarded as living proxies for the chordate ancestor, in part owing to the general similarity of the modern amphioxus to putative fossil chordates from the early Cambrian Chengjiang fauna (Yunnanozoon lividum[17], and the similar Haikouella lanceolatum[18]) and the middle Cambrian Burgess Shale (Pikaia gracilens[19]), although controversy remains (see, for example, refs 20,21). The study of key developmental genes in amphioxus has shed light on the evolution of such vertebrate organs as the brain, kidney, pancreas and pituitary, and of the genetic mechanisms of early embryonic patterning in general (reviewed by refs 22–24). Amphioxus has also served as a genomic surrogate for the protovertebrate ancestor in studies of the Hox cluster[25], in studies of specific genomic regions[26–28], and as an outgroup in numerous gene family studies (reviewed in ref. 29).

Here we report the draft genome sequence of the Florida lancelet and compare its structure with the genomes of other animals. Robust phylogenetic analysis of gene sequences and exon–intron structures confirms recent proposals that tunicates are the sister group to vertebrates, with lancelets as the most basal chordate subphylum, and that the combined echinoderm–hemichordate clade is sister to chordates. Through a comparative analysis, we identify 17 ancestral chordate linkage groups that are conserved in the modern amphioxus and vertebrate genomes despite over half a billion years of independent evolution. Over 90% of the human genome is encompassed within these linkage groups, which display a tell-tale fourfold redundancy that is consistent with whole-genome quadruplication on the vertebrate stem. Comparison with sequences from the sea squirt, lamprey, elephant shark and several bony fish constrains the timing of the whole-genome events to after the divergence of vertebrates from tunicates and lancelets, but before the split between cartilaginous and bony vertebrates. Within the resolution of our analysis, we find evidence for rounds of genome duplication both before and after the split between jawless vertebrates (for example, lamprey) and jawed vertebrates, although a period of octoploidy encompassing the divergence of jawless and jawed vertebrates remains a possibility. Although most duplicate genes from these whole-genome events have been lost, a disproportionate number of genes involved in developmental processes are retained.

Genome sequence

We sequenced the ~520 megabase (Mb) amphioxus genome using a whole-genome shotgun strategy[30] from approximately 11.5-fold redundant paired-end sequence coverage produced from random-sheared libraries with a range of insert sizes (Supplementary Note 2). Genomic DNA was prepared from the gonads of a single gravid male collected from Tampa Bay, Florida in July 2003, and exhibited extensive allelic variation (3.7% single nucleotide polymorphism, plus 6.8% polymorphic insertion/deletion; Supplementary Note 4). This is the highest level of sequence variation reported in any individual organism, exceeding that found in the purple sea urchin[31]. Assembly version 1 reports both haplotypes separately, whereas in assembly version 2 a single haplotype is selected at each locus (Supplementary Fig. 63). Assembly version 2 spans 522 Mb, with half of this sequence in 62 scaffolds longer than 2.6 Mb.

Currently there are no physical or genetic maps of amphioxus, so we could not reconstruct the genome as its 19 pairs of chromosomes[32]. Nevertheless, because half of the predicted genes are contained in scaffolds containing 138 or more genes, the current draft assembly is sufficiently long-range to permit useful analysis of conserved synteny with other species, as shown below. Comparison of the assembled sequence with open reading frames derived from expressed sequence tags (ESTs, see below) shows that the assembly captures more than 95% of the known protein-coding content, and comparison to finished clone sequences demonstrates the base-level and long-range accuracy of the assembly (Supplementary Note 2).

Protein-coding genes and transposable elements

We estimate that the haploid amphioxus genome contains 21,900 protein-coding loci. This gene complement was modelled with standard methods tuned for amphioxus, integrating homology and ab initio gene prediction methods with more than 480,000 ESTs derived from a variety of developmental stages[24] (Supplementary Note 3). Approximately two-thirds of the protein-coding loci (15,123) are captured in both haplotypes. Transposable elements constitute ~30% of the amphioxus genome assembly (Supplementary Table 5) and belong to >500 families. On the basis of their bulk contribution to the genome size, DNA transposons are twice more abundant than retrotransposons.

Polymorphism

The distribution of observed local heterozygosity over short length scales obeys a geometric distribution (Supplementary Fig. 1), consistent with the prediction of the random mating model, as observed in Ciona savignyi[33], with a population mutation rate $4\mu N_e = 0.0562$, where μ is the per generation mutation rate and N_e is the effective population size. High heterozygosity can, in principle, be explained by: (1) a large effective population size maintained over many generations, (2) a high mutation rate per generation, or (3) the recent mixing of previously isolated populations; in the latter case, a geometric distribution of local heterozygosity would not be expected. Assuming a typical metazoan mutation rate on the order of one to ten substitutions per gigabase (Gb) per generation[34,35], this observed heterozygosity between alleles suggests a large but plausible effective breeding population on the order of millions of individuals. The observed heterozygosity shows correlations at short distances that decay on scales greater than ~1 kb, indicating extensive recombination in the population (Supplementary Fig. 2). An analysis of the ratio K_a/K_s of non-synonymous to synonymous substitutions shows evidence of purifying selection comparable to that found between mammalian species (Supplementary Note 4). Insertion/deletion polymorphisms are common, as found in other intra- and inter-genome comparisons[36] (Supplementary Fig. 3). Structural variation between haplotypes also includes local inversions and tandem duplications (Supplementary Fig. 63).

Deuterostome relationships

With the draft amphioxus sequence in hand, we reconsidered the relationships within chordates and between deuterostome phyla (chordates, echinoderms and hemichordates). The traditional placement of lancelets as sister to vertebrates, with tunicates as the earliest diverging chordate subphylum, has recently been questioned[37,38]. A preliminary study[39] using 146 gene loci (33,600 aligned amino acid positions) and trace data from the present amphioxus genome project found support for tunicates as the sister to vertebrates. This analysis, however, also suggested (albeit with limited statistical support) that amphioxus is more closely related to echinoderms than to tunicates or vertebrates, which would render chordates a paraphyletic group. A second study with a similarly sized set of genes but more diverse deuterostome taxa supported the early branching of the cephalochordate lineage, but not the close relationship of amphioxus and echinoderms[40].

To address the controversial phylogenetic position of amphioxus, we analysed a much larger set of 1,090 orthologous genes (see Supplementary Note 5). Both bayesian and maximum likelihood methods support the new chordate phylogeny[38–40] in which cephalochordates represent the most basal extant chordate lineage, with tunicates (represented by both Ciona intestinalis and Oikopleura dioica in our analysis) sister to vertebrates but with long branches that indicate higher levels of amino acid substitution (Fig. 1). Individual gene trees also lend support to this topology; genes supporting tunicates as a sister group to vertebrates outnumber those with amphioxus in this position by a 2:1 ratio. An analysis of intron gain and loss in deuterostomes provides independent support for amphioxus as the basal extant chordate subphylum (see below).

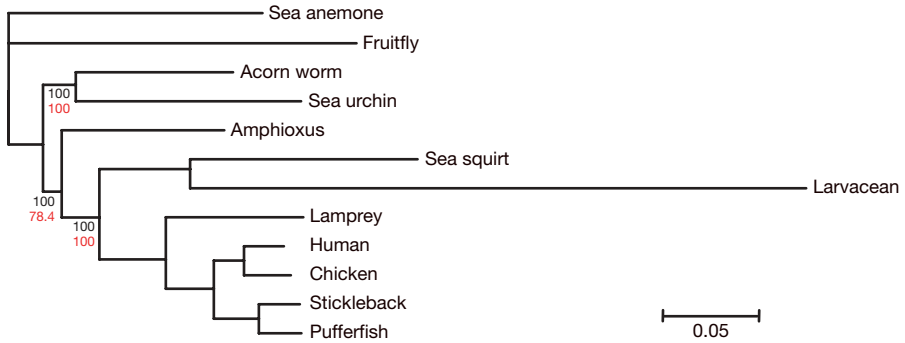

Figure 1 | Deuterostome phylogeny. Bayesian phylogenetic tree of deuterostome relationships with branch length proportional to the number of expected substitutions per amino acid position, using a concatenated alignment of 1,090 genes. The scale bar represents 0.05 expected substitutions per site in the aligned regions. Long branches for sea squirt and larvacean indicate high levels of amino acid substitution. This tree topology was observed in 100% of sampled trees (see Supplementary Note 5). Numbers in red indicate bootstrap support under maximum likelihood. Unlabelled nodes were constrained.

We group echinoderms (that is, the purple sea urchin) and hemichordates (that is, the acorn worm) together (ambulacrarians) as sister to a monophyletic chordate clade, as in ref. 41 but in contrast to the suggestion of ref. 39. With the exception of the long-branched tunicates, the maximum likelihood tree suggests a roughly constant evolutionary rate of peptide change across the deuterostome tree, although an excess of substitutions is found in the vertebrates relative to the predictions of a simple molecular clock model.

Intron evolution

To assess the evolution of gene structure within the deuterostomes and chordates, we compared the position and phase of amphioxus introns to those in other animals. Amphioxus and human (along with other vertebrates) share a large fraction of their introns (85% in alignable regions), which match precisely in both position and phase (Supplementary Note 6), as was also found in the sea anemone Nematostella vectensis[42]. We found that the intron-rich gene structures of the eumetazoan ancestor were carried forward to the common chordate ancestor with relatively few gains or losses. The tunicates C. intestinalis and Oikopleura dioica, however, share many fewer introns with vertebrates[43] or amphioxus.

Notably, intron presence or absence carries a significant (as measured by bootstrap values) phylogenetic signal, and bayesian analysis of the associated character matrix supports the sister relationship between tunicates and vertebrates (Supplementary Fig. 8; see Methods). This is evidently due to shared gain or loss of introns along the stem group leading to their common ancestor, which remarkably is still detectable despite additional extensive secondary losses, and modest gains, in the tunicate lineages. Thus, intron dynamics provide independent support for the new chordate phylogeny.

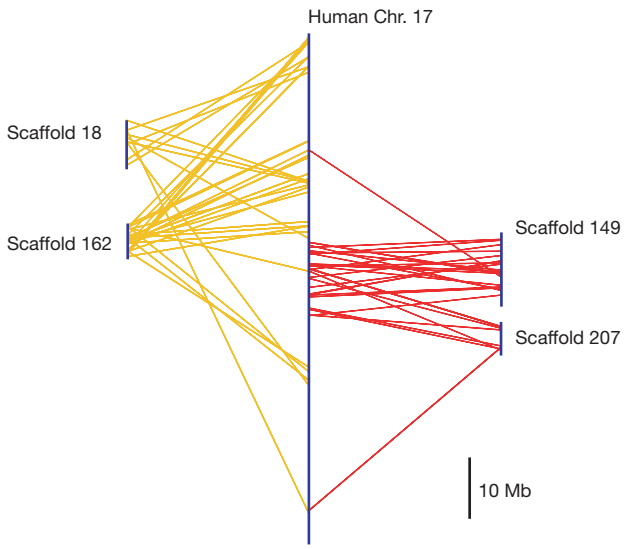

Figure 2 | Amphioxus–human synteny. Four amphioxus scaffolds from the non-redundant version 2 assembly with synteny to human chromosome (Chr.) 17. Note that orthologous genes from these scaffolds are concentrated in specific regions of the chromosome, and that several scaffolds (for example, 18 and 162, or 149 and 207) have a high density of hits to the same segments of the chromosome, which enables a partitioning of the human genome into 135 ancient segments. Supplementary File 5 contains an Oxford grid tabulating the number of orthologues for each scaffold-segment pair.

Chordate gene families and novelties

Through comparison of the amphioxus gene set with those of other animals, we identified 8,437 chordate gene families with members in amphioxus and other chordates that each nominally represent the modern descendants of a single gene in the last common chordate ancestor (Supplementary Note 7). That ancestor certainly possessed more genes than this number, but the others are inaccessible to us now owing to subsequent sequence divergence and/or gene loss in the living chordates. Through subsequent gene family expansions (by means of both local and/or genome-wide duplications), these families account for 13,610 amphioxus genes, 13,401 human genes and 7,216 C. intestinalis genes. The markedly lower number of descendant genes in C. intestinalis is largely due to gene loss[44], with the present analysis identifying 2,251 ancient chordate genes missing in this genome sequence. We found 8 apparent chordate stem gene losses (that is, genes found in sea urchin and at least one of fly and sea anemone, but not in vertebrates, amphioxus or C. intestinalis). A list of these genes can be found in Supplementary Table 10.

We identified 239 apparent chordate gene novelties, that is, gene families represented in amphioxus and at least one vertebrate or Ciona, but without an obvious direct counterpart in non-chordate genomes. These can be characterized[42] as 137 families with no detectable sequence similarity to non-chordate genes (type I novelties), 10 containing one or more chordate-specific domains linked to pre-existing metazoan domains (type II novelties), and 92 with chordate-specific combinations of pre-existing metazoan domains (type III novelties; see Supplementary Note 7). These gene families and others of special interest to vertebrate biology are discussed in a separate paper[45].

Amphioxus–vertebrate synteny

We have found extensive conservation of gene linkage on the scale of whole chromosomes (macro-synteny) between the amphioxus genome and those of vertebrates (represented in our analysis by human, chicken and teleost fish), but only limited conservation of local gene order (micro-synteny). Through comparative analysis of these conserved features, we reconstructed the gene complements of 17 linkage groups (that is, proto-chromosomes) of the last common chordate ancestor. When vertebrate genomes are analysed in the light of these putative ancestral chordate chromosomes, a clear pattern of global fourfold conserved macro-synteny is found, demonstrating that two rounds of whole-genome duplication occurred on the vertebrate stem.

Reconstruction of chordate linkage groups

To identify ancestral chordate linkage groups, we first noted that many individual amphioxus scaffolds show conserved syntenic associations with human chromosomes, reflecting conserved linkage between the two genomes (Fig. 2; see also Oxford Grid in Supplementary File 5; for simplicity, we emphasize the amphioxus–human comparison in the main text, and include similar results for chicken, stickleback and pufferfish as Supplementary Information). Ninety-six scaffolds (out of 129 that possess 20 or more independent vertebrate orthologues) have a significant ($P < 0.05$, multiple test corrected) concentration of orthologues on one or more human chromosome. In contrast, only 12 C. intestinalis scaffolds (out of 134 that contain 20 or more vertebrate orthologues) show significant synteny to human chromosomes.

Genes on individual amphioxus scaffolds have orthologues that are generally concentrated in specific regions of vertebrate chromosomes (Fig. 2). Furthermore, multiple amphioxus scaffolds typically exhibit hits to the same sets of human chromosomal regions. Within each region, only limited conservation of gene order is observed (Methods; Supplementary Note 8). This pattern of conserved synteny shows that genome rearrangements have not erased the imprint of the genome organization of the last common chordate ancestor from the present human and amphioxus genomes. By using this pattern, we identified 135 human chromosomal segments (listed in Supplementary Table 14) that retain relict signals of the ancestral chordate karyotype despite chromosomal rearrangements in each lineage (Methods). These segments span a mean of 170 genes.

We exploited the pattern of amphioxus–human synteny to identify 17 ancient chordate linkage groups (CLGs) by clustering both amphioxus scaffolds and human chromosomal segments according to their pattern of hits in the other genome (Methods). The resulting 'dot plot' (Supplementary Fig. 64) shows that orthologues are concentrated in 17 distinct blocks. Within each block, gene order is considerably scrambled. The natural interpretation of these blocks is that each represents an ancient chordate linkage group that evolved into a defined group of chromosomal segments in amphioxus, human, chicken and teleost fish.

We tested our interpretation of the chordate linkage groups as coherently evolving segments by using fluorescent in situ hybridization (FISH) to demonstrate that 15 out of 16 scaffolds from CLG 15 localized to a single amphioxus chromosome. (FISH of the BACs corresponding to the sixteenth scaffold were ambiguous; see Supplementary Table 2.) Similarly, an independent study of amphioxus cosmids containing NK group homeobox genes in CLG 7 found that they localize to several distant regions of a single chromosome in amphioxus[27,28]. These data support the claim that the 17 putative ancestral chordate linkage groups have been maintained in modern amphioxus as coherent chromosomal segments. The 19 pairs of modern amphioxus chromosomes, however, imply at least (see below) two subsequent fissions in the amphioxus lineage.

Within these segments, nearly 60% of the human genes that possess amphioxus orthologues participate in the conserved linkage groups. This represents a lower bound, because short amphioxus scaffolds are less likely to be assigned to CLGs. Conversely, 88% of amphioxus gene models on scaffolds assigned to a CLG have their human orthologue in a conserved position (that is, in the same CLG). Remarkably, to the resolution of our analysis, some entire chromosomes (for example, human 18 and 21; chicken 7, 12, 15, 19, 21, 24 and 27) and chromosome arms (including human 5p) seem to have maintained their integrity (with local scrambling and some gene gain and loss) since the last common chordate ancestor. The CLGs defined by comparing amphioxus and vertebrate genomes also provide a new perspective on tunicate genome evolution, because it appears that C. intestinalis chromosomes 10, 12 and 14 are each relicts of a single CLG (11, 5 and 8, respectively), and other conserved linkages are evident (Supplementary Fig. 14).

Quadruple conserved synteny

We can trace the evolution of chordate genomes through time using two additional types of evidence. First, we can constrain the timing of specific chromosome breaks by parsimony analysis of conserved synteny across human, chicken and teleost genomes. Second, we can use the presence (or absence) of paralogous gene pairs to identify segments derived from the same chordate proto-chromosome by duplication (or fission).

For example, five groups of human segments from chromosomes 1, 5, 9 and 19 cluster together in CLG 1 (Supplementary Note 8; Supplementary Fig. 64). The segment pair 1.5/7 from chromosome 1 is related to each of the others by a significant concentration of ancient gene paralogues (17 to 31 pairs, $P < 1 \times 10^{-10}$), indicating that it is related to the others by duplication. In contrast, only a single pair of ancient paralogues relates segments 5.1 and 9.1/3, and orthologues of the genes in these segments occur predominantly on the same chromosomes of both pufferfish and stickleback. Thus, 5.1 and 9.1/3 were probably created by breakage of a single ancestral segment of the genome of the bony vertebrate ancestor. If 5.1 and 9.1/3 are virtually merged, then all remaining pairings of human segments from CLG 1 show a significant excess of ancient paralogues, consistent with amplification to four through two successive duplications.

To obtain a genome-wide view of the history of chromosomal evolution on the vertebrate stem, we applied a similar analysis systematically to the 17 CLGs by exhaustively evaluating all partitionings of human genome segments, and using a parsimony criterion to identify the most likely reconstruction. The most parsimonious partitionings of human segments into paralogy groups is summarized in Supplementary Table 1, and is diagrammed in Fig. 3. This analysis shows that most of the human genome (112 segments spanning 2.68 Gb, or 95% of the euchromatic genome) was affected by large-scale duplication events on the vertebrate stem before the bony vertebrate radiation (that is, the teleost/tetrapod split), and that nearly all of the ancient chordate chromosomes were quadruplicated (Supplementary Fig. 9).

This pattern of genome-wide quadruple conserved synteny[15] definitively demonstrates the occurrence of two rounds of whole-genome duplication (2*R*) and provides a comprehensive reconstruction of the evolutionary origin of the human chromosomes (and those of other jawed vertebrates) through these duplications on the vertebrate stem. This characterization extends previous lines of evidence for whole-genome duplication events based on comparative studies of specific regions of interest across chordate genomes (for example, the Hox cluster[25] and the major histocompatibility complex region[28,46]) and the analysis of vertebrate gene families (reviewed in ref. 29), as well as the identification of paralogous segments and chromosomal relationships within the human genome[10,13,14,47]. A manual, phylogeny-based analysis of the four scaffolds making up the NK homeobox-containing paralogon was in agreement with these results (Methods).

Timing of events on the vertebrate stem

The amphioxus–human synteny analysis presented here demonstrates that two rounds of whole-genome duplication occurred on the vertebrate stem after the divergence of cephalochordates but before the split of teleosts and tetrapods. The next question is whether these two genome-scale duplications happened in rapid succession or even effectively simultaneously, or were separated in time[15]. We sought to resolve the 2*R* events relative to the divergence of cartilaginous fish, urochordates and jawless vertebrates (for example, lamprey).

Sample sequencing from the elephant shark Callorhynchus milii, for example, demonstrates significant conserved macrosynteny between cartilaginous fish and humans, because pairs of genes that are ~35–40 kb apart in the elephant shark genome are also linked on the human genome[48]. These links occur predominantly within the human segments defined above, indicating that the orthologous chromosome segments are also found in the elephant shark genome (Supplementary Note 9). Furthermore, previous analysis of phylogenetic topologies dated all duplications before the split between cartilaginous and bony vertebrates[49]. Therefore, 2*R* occurred before this split[48]. Similarly, the preservation of several CLGs as intact single chromosomes in C. intestinalis (Supplementary Fig. 14) implies that both rounds of duplication occurred after the divergence of the urochordate lineage.

Sequencing of the repeat-rich lamprey genome has not generated enough long scaffolds to permit large-scale analysis of synteny[50]. To infer the timing of 2*R* relative to the divergence of the lamprey lineage, we generated a set of ~50,000 ESTs from the sea lamprey Petromyzon marinus (Supplementary Note 3) and analysed the phylogenetic topology of 358 gene families that include pairs of synteny-confirmed human paralogues produced during 2*R*. The results are summarized

Table 1 | Timing of whole-genome duplications

Gene 'X' from	Number of phylogenies attempted	Number of resolved trees	Number of resolved trees with 'X' as ingroup	Percentage (mean ± standard error)
Ciona intestinalis (sea squirt)	736	273	34	12 ± 2%
Petromyzon marinus (lamprey)	358	159	93	58 ± 6%
Fugu rubripes (pufferfish)	1009	389	351	90 ± 5%

in Table 1, along with a parallel analysis using sea squirt and pufferfish for comparison. We find that ~58% of the resolved four-gene phylogenies place the lamprey gene closer to one of the human paralogues; this is similar to the results of ref. 51 but analyses a tenfold larger set of gene families (Supplementary Fig. 2). This result is clearly distinct from that expected if the lamprey lineage diverged either much before (as for sea squirt) or after (as for pufferfish) 2*R*. The remaining scenarios are either that the jawed vertebrate and lamprey lineages diverged in the period between two well-separated whole-genome duplications, or that one, or both, of the 2*R* whole-genome events occurred nearly coincident with the lamprey lineage divergence. The time interval that distinguishes 'nearly coincident' from 'well-separated' is determined by the process of rediploidization, during which most gene duplicates are lost and the sequences of the surviving paralogues diverge[9,15].

Karyotypic changes in the vertebrate and tunicate lineages

From the 17 ancestral chordate linkage groups, 2*R* nominally produced $17 \times 4 = 68$ proto-vertebrate segments, although this naive inference assumes that, first, all duplicated segments were retained and, second, no fusions, fissions or additional segmental duplications occurred during 2*R*. Some 2*R*-produced segments, however, are consistently linked in contemporary bony vertebrate genomes (for example, 12b and 1d, which co-occur on human chromosome 1, chicken chromosome 8 and stickleback linkage groups III and VIII), indicating a fusion before the bony vertebrate (osteichthyan) ancestor. We found evidence for at least 20 such fusions (Supplementary Note 8). Allowing for a range of nearly parsimonious reconstructions of 2*R*, we estimate that the bony vertebrate ancestor had between 37 and 49 chromosomes. Additional fusions on the teleost stem reduced this number to 12 (refs 52–56) before the teleost-specific genome duplication. On the tetrapod stem, the chicken and human genomes share 4 fusions of bony vertebrate segments, suggesting 33–45 chromosomes. These are consistent with recent estimates based on intra-vertebrate comparisons[47,52–56].

Ancient developmental gene linkages

The amphioxus genome has also retained ancient local gene linkages (micro-synteny) in addition to conserved macro-synteny. In some cases, local linkages are even older than the chordates, and date back to the bilaterian ancestor or earlier. As an example, we considered gene families that expanded by tandem duplication early in animal evolution, specifically, the Antennapedia (ANTP) and Paired (PRD) classes of homeobox genes and the Wnt gene family. We examined how frequently these genes are still neighbours in the amphioxus genome, and discovered five new examples of ancient pairs or clusters of ANTP or PRD genes: (1) Otx and goosecoid, (2) Mnx and ro, (3) Nkx2-1 and Nkx2-2, (4) Nkx6, Nkx7, Lbx and Tlx, and (5) En, Nedxa, Nedxb and Dll (Supplementary Table 3). These gene pairs or clusters (along with the well-known Hox, ParaHox and NK linkages) originated by tandem duplication before the divergence of bilaterians, yet their tight linkage has not been disrupted by genome rearrangement. The Nkx2-1/Nkx2-2 gene pair has been retained in vertebrates (and is duplicated), but in every other example the tight linkage (clustering) has been lost in the human genome. None of the five newly described examples are retained in the Drosophila melanogaster genome. The situation in the Wnt gene family is a little different, because both amphioxus and Drosophila have retained tight linkages that have been disrupted in the human lineage owing to genome duplication followed by differential gene loss (Fig. 4). These results underscore the fact that the amphioxus genome has undergone less genomic rearrangement than the human and other vertebrate genomes since their shared ancestor more than half a billion years ago.

Impact of whole-genome duplications

How many duplicate genes survive in modern vertebrate genomes from the two genome-wide events? Twenty-five per cent (2,131) of the ancestral chordate gene families (out of the 8,437 indicated above) have two or more ancient vertebrate paralogues ('ohnologues') that were evidently produced by ancient gene duplication(s) after the divergence of amphioxus (see also Supplementary Fig. 3). Of these, 1,489 (70%) are embedded within paralogous segments from our reconstruction of 2*R*, as portrayed in Fig. 3, and were plausibly created through 2*R*. These retention rates for 2*R*-duplicated genes are comparable to other estimates based on large-scale gene phylogenies[10,14,57,58]. Similar retention rates were found for the ~350-million-year-old teleost-fish-specific duplication[55,59–61] and were estimated for the ~40-million-year-old genome duplication found in the frog Xenopus laevis[62].

Gene duplicates from 2*R* that have been retained in modern genomes are significantly enriched for functions associated with signal transduction, transcriptional regulation, neuronal activities and developmental processes (Supplementary Table 18, Methods). For example, genes implicated in signal transduction are more than twice as likely to be retained in two or more copies from 2*R* compared to the overall retention rate. These results are consistent with the hypothesis that paralogues created by whole-genome duplication were recruited for roles in the development of novel features of vertebrate biology, and with similar biased retention in teleost fishes[61]. Whole-genome duplications, however, may have allowed entire molecular pathways to be duplicated and sub-functionalized coincidently (reviewed in ref. 63). Whereas similar numbers of gene duplicates are found in amphioxus relative to the chordate ancestor, different gene classes have been expanded, and the mechanism of gene duplication is different (Supplementary Note 7).

Conserved non-coding sequences

Inspired by the extensive conserved synteny between amphioxus and vertebrates, we searched for conserved non-coding sequences that might reflect ancient chordate cis-regulatory elements. Genome-scale comparisons between mammals and teleost fish have revealed up to 3,100 conserved non-coding sequences, most of which function as tissue-specific enhancers[64,65]. At greater phylogenetic distances, no conservation outside of coding sequences and conserved microRNAs[66] has been identified so far. By aligning the amphioxus and human genomes (Supplementary Note 10), 77 putative chordate conserved non-coding elements were identified (>60% identity over >50 bp), after excluding transcribed or repetitive sequences and requiring conservation in at least one other vertebrate. Of these, 16

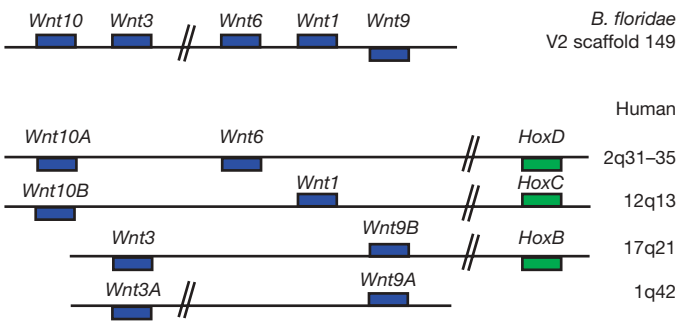

Figure 4 | Ancient developmental gene linkages. In the amphioxus genome, Wnt6, Wnt1 and Wnt9 form a compact gene cluster 2.5 Mb from Wnt10 and Wnt3 but all are on scaffold 149. Orthologues of four of these genes are also clustered in Drosophila (not shown), although Wnt3 has been lost, as inferred from its presence in cnidarians. The human orthologues are on four chromosomes, and show disruption of gene clustering through duplication followed by gene loss. Linkages of Hox clusters to three of the human loci gives additional support for the large-scale duplication events involved. The three clusters that are linked to Hox clusters (as well as the four Hox clusters) fall in chromosome segments grouped in CLG 16, as does the Hox-bearing amphioxus scaffold. Genes drawn as boxes above the horizontal lines are transcribed from left to right; genes depicted below the lines are transcribed from right to left.

overlap with or are immediately adjacent to the 3′ or 5′ untranslated regions (UTRs) of human genes, and are probably conserved UTR elements. Four are adjacent to exons and probably represent conserved splicing enhancers. A single conserved noncoding element overlapped a highly conserved microRNA gene (mir-10b adjacent to the human HOXD4 gene). The remaining 56 elements are of unknown function, but can be tested experimentally for enhancer activity[45].

Conclusions

The amphioxus sequence reveals key features of the genome of the last common ancestor of all chordates through comparison with the genomes of other animals. This ancestor probably lived before the Cambrian period, and gave rise to the chordate lineage that is represented today by modern cephalochordates such as amphioxus, as well as urochordates and vertebrates. Of the living lineages, the cephalochordates diverged first, before the split between the morphologically diverse urochordates and vertebrates. To a remarkable extent, the amphioxus genome appears to be a good surrogate for the ancestral chordate genome with respect to gene content, exon–intron gene structure and even chromosomal organization. The sequences of model ascidians with small genomes are by comparison simplified by gene loss, intron loss and genome rearrangement. Remarkably, modest levels of non-coding sequence have been conserved between amphioxus and human—the oldest conserved non-coding regions yet detected through direct sequence alignment—and may provide a tantalizing glimpse of the gene regulatory systems of the last common chordate ancestor.

Extensive conserved synteny between the genomes of amphioxus and various vertebrates lends unprecedented clarity and coherence to the history of genome-scale events in vertebrate evolution. The human and other jawed vertebrate genomes show widespread quadruple-conserved synteny relative to the amphioxus sequence, which extends earlier regional studies and provides a unified explanation for paralogous chromosomal regions in vertebrates. Our analysis thus provides conclusive evidence for two rounds of complete genome duplication on the jawed vertebrate stem. These genome duplications occurred after the divergence of urochordates but before the split between cartilaginous fish and bony vertebrates. The jawless vertebrates (for example, lamprey and hagfish) represent the only other chordate lineages that survive from this period, and at least the lamprey appears to have diverged between the two rounds of duplication, although the data still allow for an octoploid population as the progenitor of the jawless and jawed vertebrates. The detailed mechanism of these events—in particular, whether they occurred by allo- and/or auto-tetraploidizations, how closely spaced in time they were, and the precise nature of the rediploidization process—remain unknown. Although it is tempting to relate the genome duplications to specific morphological radiations in vertebrate evolution, the fossil record reflects a relatively steady diversification rather than a dramatic discontinuity of stem-group vertebrate forms[67].

The genomic features that are associated with organismal complexity, if such generic features exist at all, remain unknown[68]. It is tempting to speculate, however, that the creation of the ancestral jawed vertebrate genome by two rounds of genome duplication was a formative event in the early history of vertebrates that provided genomic flexibility through the duplication of coding and cis-regulatory sequences for the emergence of familiar developmental, morphological and physiological novelties such as chondrogenic and skeletogenic neural crest cells, the sclerotome (vertebral) compartment of the somites, elaborate hindbrain patterning, finely graded nervous system organization, and the elaborated endocrine system of vertebrates. Indeed, we find that genes involved in developmental signalling and gene regulation are significantly more likely to be retained in multiple copies in living species than genes overall, suggesting that diversified developmental regulation is correlated with the evolution of vertebrate novelties. This begs the question, dating back to Ohno, of how such duplicated genes became integrated into the biochemical and genetic networks of vertebrates. In a separate paper[45], we examine vertebrate biology in the light of the amphioxus genome data and the genome-scale duplication events on the vertebrate stem.

METHODS SUMMARY

Genome sequencing, assembly and annotation. High-quality sequence Sanger reads (7.3 million) were generated and assembled using JAZZ[69]. Protein-coding genes were annotated using EST, homology and ab initio methods as described previously[42,70].

Deuterostome relationships. Orthologous gene alignments were created using ClustalW[71] and Gblocks[72], and analysed with bayesian and maximum likelihood methods.

Intron evolution. The presence and absence of an intron at each of 5,337 orthologous coding positions was treated as a binary character in parsimony and bayesian analyses.

Construction of chordate linkage groups. Human chromosome segments and amphioxus scaffolds were clustered by orthologue distribution profile. The null hypothesis (orthologous genes randomly distributed across the two genomes) was evaluated using Fisher's exact test, with a Bonferroni correction for the total number of pairwise tests.

Decomposition of CLGs into independent products of duplication. The most parsimonious partitioning of the human chromosomal segments assigned to the CLG was obtained using a scoring system that included shared ohnologues and position in the multi-species synteny comparison.

NK quadruple conserved synteny. In addition to the genome-wide synteny analysis, a detailed manual curation was carried out on four v1 scaffolds (56, 124, 185 and 294) that make up the NK homeobox cluster in amphioxus. The 82 amphioxus genes correspond to 111 human genes enriched on chromosomes 4, 5, 8 and 10 (chi-squared test, $P \ll 0.001$), in agreement with the genome-wide analysis of CLG 7 (Supplementary Note 11).

Ancient developmental gene linkages. Orthology of homeodomain- and Wnt-containing genes was assigned from phylogenetic tree reconstruction using neighbour-joining and maximum likelihood approaches, supported by high bootstrap values.

METHODS

Genome sequence and assembly. High-quality sequence Sanger reads (7.3 million) were generated and assembled using JAZZ[69,73]. See Supplementary Note 2 for details of the genomic libraries, assembly methods and validation.

Annotation of protein-coding genes. Protein-coding genes were annotated by the JGI annotation pipeline as previously described[42,70]. See Supplementary Note 3 for a description of amphioxus-specific details. Gene models representing allelic pairs were identified using a combination of similarity of predicted peptide sequence and gene neighbourhood context (Supplementary Note 3).

Deuterostome relationships. Sets of orthologous genes were collected by grouping together mutual-best BLAST[74] hits between N. vectensis (sea anemone) and gene sets from other published deuterostome genomes plus expressed sequence data from the acorn worm Saccoglossus kowalevskii[75] and the sea lamprey P. marinus (Supplementary Note 5). Individual multiple alignments were created with CLUSTALW[71], were manually reviewed, trimmed with Gblocks[72], and concatenated. Orthologue sets (364) had representation from all genomes (alignment 1), and 1,090 had up to one missing (alignment 2). The alignments were analysed by bayesian and maximum likelihood methods, respectively, using MrBayes[76,77] and PHYML[78]. Supplementary Note 5 contains more details of the data sources, data compilation and analysis.

Intron evolution. A collection of 5,337 orthologous well-aligned coding sequence positions that contain an intron in at least one genome was analysed by weighted parsimony analysis with PAUP[79] and Bayesian analysis with MrBayes[76,77] (Supplementary Note 6).

Chordate gene families. Using predicted proteomes for human, chicken, stickleback, pufferfish, sea squirt, amphioxus, sea urchin, fruitfly and sea anemone (Supplementary Note 5), families ('clusters') of orthologous genes were constructed to represent the ancestral gene complements of the tetrapod, teleost, jawed vertebrate, 'olfactores' (that is, vertebrates plus urochordates), chordate and deuterostome ancestors, as described previously[42], with modifications described in Supplementary Note 7.

Chromosome segmentation. The human, chicken and stickleback chromosomes were segmented iteratively by comparison to one another and to the scaffolds of the Fugu genome assembly. See Supplementary Note 8 for complete details.

Construction of chordate linkage groups. For whole-genome synteny analysis, orthology between genomes was based on c-score (BLAST score/best BLAST score) clustering as previously described[42], with a c-score threshold of 0.75 when comparing human and amphioxus, and 0.95 when comparing human to other vertebrates. To define initial CLGs (Supplementary Fig. 64), human chromosome segments and amphioxus scaffolds were clustered using the same method as for chromosome segmentation, with a correlation threshold of 0.25. Statistical significance of orthologue concentration between regions of one genome and another was computed with Fisher's exact test with a Bonferroni correction for the total number of pairwise tests (see Supplementary Note 8 for additional details).

Fluorescent in situ hybridization. Chromosome preparation was performed as described previously[80] with modifications described in Supplementary Note 8.

Multi-species synteny comparison. The clustering protocol described above for human–amphioxus was repeated for human–Fugu, human–stickleback and human–Nematostella to define clusters of scaffolds or chromosome segments (a 'cluster set') for each genome based on comparison to human. All pairs of human chromosome segments were compared to each cluster set, and for each set were classified as having conserved synteny to the same cluster (coded with '1'), having conserved synteny (only) to different clusters (coded with '0'), or having indeterminate conserved synteny if one or both human segments lack significant conserved synteny to any cluster in the cluster set (coded with '?'). The complete results are represented as a colour-coded matrix in Supplementary Fig. 9.

Identification of ohnologues. Operationally, we define a pair of human genes as ohnologues (paralogues descendent from 2*R* in vertebrate evolution) if they are found in the same chordate gene family (excluding large gene families with more than ten members) and are ancient paralogues differing by more than 0.2 transversions per site at synonymous positions. (We use transversions rather than the more common total substitutions because transversions occur more slowly and therefore show less saturation at the timescales of interest.)

Decomposition of CLGs into independent products of duplication. For each CLG, all partitionings of the human chromosomal segments assigned to the CLG were tabulated. Each partitioning was assigned a score as follows: $+1$ for each pair of segments from different partitions with a significant number of predicted ohnologues between them; -1 for each pair of segments from different partitions without a significant number of ohnologues between them. Among the partitionings with the maximum score, ties were broken by using the multi-species synteny comparison results: a score of $+\varepsilon$ for each pair of segments from different partitions coloured red or orange, and a score of $-\varepsilon$ for each pair of segments from different partitions where multi-synteny comparison indicates the two segments were one segment in the jawed vertebrate ancestor (coloured blue or purple in Supplementary Figs 9 and 10), where epsilon is a positive number much less than 1.

Timing of genome duplications. Genes from pufferfish, lamprey and sea squirt ('X') were aligned to pairs of human ohnologues ('Hs1' and 'Hs2') and the orthologous amphioxus gene; phylogenetic position was considered resolved if it has at least 50% maximum likelihood bootstrap support (Supplementary Note 9 and Supplementary Fig. 11).

Ancient developmental gene linkages. Genes were identified by tBLASTn against version 1.0 of the B. floridae genome assembly with vertebrate and invertebrate homeodomain and Wnt sequences. Orthology was assigned from phylogenetic tree reconstruction using neighbour-joining and maximum likelihood approaches. Support for nodes was assessed by bootstrapping; all gene families were recovered with high support. Human data from Ensembl release 47 were used. Supplementary Table 3 lists the genes and gene models examined.

Functional categorization of retained duplicate genes. PANTHER functional annotations were mapped to inferred ancestral chordate genes, and subsets of these genes were analysed for enrichment in functional categories by methods previously described for the analysis of ancestral eumetazoan genes[42]. Because functional annotations overlap, the category of 'developmental processes' is itself dominated by genes associated with signal transduction and transcriptional regulation.

"The Amphioxus Song" or, "It's a Long Way From Amphioxus"

Lyrics by Philip H. Pope, 1921. (sung to the tune of "Its a Long Way to Tipperary")

A fish-like thing appeared among the annelids one day.
It hadn't any parapods nor setae to display.
It hadn't any eyes nor jaws, nor ventral nervous cord,
But it had a lot of gill slits and it had a notochord.

Chorus:
It's a long way from Amphioxus. It's a long way to us.
It's a long way from Amphioxus to the meanest human cuss.
Well, it's goodbye to fins and gill slits, and it's welcome lungs and hair!
It's a long, long way from Amphioxus, but we all came from there.

It wasn't much to look at and it scarce knew how to swim,
And Nereis was very sure it hadn't come from him.
The mollusks wouldn't own it and the arthropods got sore,
So the poor thing had to burrow in the sand along the shore.

He burrowed in the sand before a crab could nip his tail,
And he said "Gill slits and myotomes are all to no avail.
I've grown some metapleural folds and sport an oral hood,
But all these fine new characters don't do me any good.

(chorus)

It sulked awhile down in the sand without a bit of pep,
Then he stiffened up his notochord and said, "I'll beat 'em yet!
Let 'em laugh and show their ignorance. I don't mind their jeers. *
Just wait until they see me in a hundred million years. *

My notochord shall turn into a chain of vertebrae
And as fins my metapleural folds will agitate the sea.
My tiny dorsal nervous cord will be a mighty brain
And the vertebrates shall dominate the animal domain.

(chorus)

* note -- the two lines marked by asterisks are not the original words, which are:
I've got more possibilities within my slender frame
Than all these proud invertebrates that treat me with such shame.

Supplementary Note 2. Genome sequencing and assembly

2.1 BAC library.

A Bacterial Artificial Chromosome (BAC) library (CHORI-302) was constructed by Chung-Li Shu and Kazutoyo Osoegawa in Pieter de Jong's laboratory, BACPAC Resources, Children's Hospital Oakland Research Institute. This library provides an estimated 17-fold coverage of the genome. The average size of the inserts in the library is 142 kb. The library is available through Children's Hospital Oakland Research Institute (http://bacpac.chori.org/amphiox302.htm). BAC clones were end sequenced at RIKEN-GSC and JGI-Stanford Human Genome Center and these sequences are deposited in the NCBI Trace Archive.

2.2 Genome assembly and validation.

Supplementary Table S4 summarizes the whole genome shotgun libraries and data set. This Whole Genome Shotgun project has been deposited at DDBJ/EMBL/GenBank under the project accession ABEP00000000. The versions described in this paper include the first version, ABEP01000000, and Version 2, ABEP02000000.

Assembly Versions 1 and 1.5: Haplotypes assembled apart

The shotgun reads were initially assembled using JAZZ [1]. We estimated that the haploid genome size is approximately 500 Mbp, and that the two haploid genomes of the donor animal are represented independently in the assembly as separate haplotypes, each approximately 85% complete, with at least one locus assembled for more than 95% of genomic loci (see below).

Comparison of the haplotypes by aligning the nucleotide sequence of the reconstructed genome fragments highlighted a number of likely mis-assemblies (global mis-joins) in the initial scaffolds. A manual search for potential mis-joins based on an assumption of long-range co-linearity of the two haplotypes identified a total of 331, or about one every 2.5 Mb of assembled sequence. When an assumption of haplotypic co-linearity implied a mis-assembly in one of two scaffolds, both scaffolds were broken. Short internal inversions were allowed if flanked by co-linear regions. The resulting fragments were ordered and oriented with JAZZ using BAC- and fosmid-end read pairs to link them. Roughly one third (129) of the identified breaks came back together in the new assembly, and 202 remain split. While this approach may lead us to break correctly assembled regions where the assumption of long-range co-linearity is violated by large-scale structural polymorphisms, the predominance of short inversion polymorphisms (of order 1kb) over intermediate length scale differences (of order 10kb - 100 kb) indicates that structural variation at the scaffold length scale may be rare.

The resulting assembly (version 1) contains a total of 3,032 scaffolds (total length 923,340,504 bp) composed of 81,073 contigs (total length of 831,199,399 bp). Half of the total contig sequence is contained in the largest 9,177 contigs (contig N50), which are each longer than 25,666 bp (contig L50). Half of the total scaffold sequence is in the largest 174 scaffolds, which are each longer than 1.6 Mb. This assembly as available for download and interactive examination at http://www.jgi.doe.gov/Brafl1/Brafl1.home.html and deposited at GenBank as accession ABEP01000000. There were 332,545 unplaced reads with a total trimmed length of 194 Mb, or 4.4% of the 7.6 million-read starting data set. Supplementary File sf1.txt contains a list of the read identifiers for these unplaced reads; their sequences are available from the NCBI Trace Archive, along with the complete WGS data set.

Following automatic and manual annotation of gene models (Supplementary Note 3), examples of mis-assemblies in version 1 of a specific type were identified: allelic pairs of genomic sequence tens to hundreds of kilobases in length are sometimes assembled in tandem in the same scaffold, rather than on different scaffolds. Mis-assemblies of this type ("stutters") were identified in the largest 1000 scaffolds, spanning 97% of the assembly, by visual inspection of the sequence self-alignment dot plot and the 8kb mate-pair assembly layout. 574 stutters spanning ~6% of assembly version 1 were identified and removed from these scaffolds to create assembly version 1.5, with all break points but one chosen to avoid overlap with gene models to preserve annotations.

Assembly version 1 allelic structure

In preliminary shotgun assemblies, we noted that previously cloned and sequenced Branchiostoma floridae genomic sequences typically aligned to two locations in the assembly. This could in principle be explained by (a) separate assembly of two divergent haplotypes from the diploid donor, (b) a recent whole genome or large-scale segmental duplication in amphioxus, or (c) an aberrantly allotetraploid mutant individual donor genome. A recent genome duplication affecting the entire species (hypothesis (b)) can be ruled out because numerous FISH studies with different individuals have identified only single physical positions on the chromosomes for markers such as the HOX and paraHOX clusters. In addition to being a priori very unlikely, the amphioxus-specific allotetraploidy hypothesis (c) does not agree with the observed distribution of the number of single nucleotide differences in windows along the two haplotypes (see Supplementary Note 4 below). We therefore conclude that the assembly typically represents the two alleles at a given genomic locus with independent sequences.

To estimate how commonly two haplotypes are collapsed together due to locally low heterozygosity (or any other reason), we examined the depth of coverage of reads placed by the assembler in (1) the 200 largest scaffolds and (2) all the smaller scaffolds in the version 1 assembly. The distributions (shown in Supplementary Figure S22) are peaked at a depth of ~5, and do not show a peak near double this depth as would be expected for regions that represent the collapse of two haplotypes onto a single sequence. This distribution is, however, quite broad, and it is possible that there is some contribution from local regions assembled at twice the nominal depth of coverage for each haplotype. 4% of the length of these scaffolds is spanned by segments composed of two or more consecutive 5kb bins with mean read coverage exceeding 8X suggesting that this fraction of the assembly may represent regions where both alleles are collapsed in to a single consensus.

Unassembled reads

Since the assembler is by design biased against assembling potentially repetitive sequences appearing at unusually high depth in the shotgun reads, we tested the hypothesis that genomic regions of low heterozygosity have been left unassembled. We compared the distribution of the number of "overlaps" (sequence alignments to other reads in the shotgun data set) for all reads to that for the unassembled reads (Supplementary Figure S24). Overlaps are semi-global alignments of at least 85% identity of at least 250 bp in length. The distribution for all reads is peaked around 10, as expected for a random shotgun at 5X coverage (each read has ~5 alignments to the left, and ~5 to the right). Rather than having unusually many overlaps, the distribution for the unplaced reads shows that the vast majority of these reads have unusually few overlaps. This is a result either of sequence contamination, cloning and/or sequencing bias, or of a high prevalence in these reads of 16-mers that are found at extremely high copy number in the data set, representing highly repetitive sequences rather than two haplotypes.

Completeness

Of 11,628 expressed sequence tag (EST) cluster assemblies (see Supplementary Note 3) with an apparently complete open reading frame, 95.3% had at least one alignment of at least 80% identity, spanning more than 50% of its length to the assembly, indicating that the assembly is approximately 95% complete in capturing at least one allele of known genes.

Genome size estimate

Since 69% (15,123) of the estimated total of 21,955 genes are represented by an allelic pair of gene models (See Supplementary Note 3), assuming that the fraction missing from the assembly of each haplotype is approximately independent, we estimate that each haplotype is (0.69)^(1/2), or ~83% complete. This would lead us to expect that 0.17 x 0.17 or ~3% of loci would be missing by chance from both haplotypes, which is close to, and consistent with, the observed 4.7% of EST clusters that do not align to the assembly. Based on the total length of the assembled contigs, and the estimate that each haplotype is 83% complete, the genome size of the assembled portion of the genome is estimated at 831 / (2 x 0.83) = 500 Mb.

In light of these analyses, the assembly appears to capture two independent haplotypes with substantial completeness, in a manner that is not obviously biased by local fluctuations in heterozygosity.

Assembly Version 2: Allelic redundancy removed

As an additional resource we created a non-redundant representation (Version 2) of the genome sequence which is a mosaic of the two haplotypes found in assembly Version 1. The 1000 longest scaffolds of assembly version 1.5 were aligned to one another using MegaBLAST[2], and manually curated into 398 connected sets of allelic scaffolds, examples of which are shown in Supplementary Figure S63. In this process, 132 potential mis-joins were identified in Version 1.5 scaffolds and broken. Each of the 398 sets of allelic scaffolds was merged into a non-redundant representative sequence which is a mosaic of the two haplotypes, created by concatenating segments of the scaffolds in the set. The mosaic was constructed to switch between haplotypes only between gene models, and to minimize the number of transitions between haplotypes. Among the possible tilings with the minimum number of transitions, we selected that which minimizes the total length of sequence gaps in the merged sequence. This method is similar in spirit to that applied to the Ciona savignyi genome by Small et al [3]. Assembly version 2 spans 522 Mb, with scaffold N/L50 = 62 / 2.6 Mb and contig N/L50 = 4916 / 28kb. The net assembly length is slightly longer than the estimated haploid genome size, which could be accounted for by contributions from internal assembly gaps, residual allelic redundancy and haplotype-unique sequences. A mapping of the gene models created for assembly version 1 (Supplementary Note 3) is available from the amphioxus genome portal in gff format.

Assembly Validation

To assess the accuracy of the shotgun assembly, we compared assemblies version 1 and 2 to the 33 clones from CHORI-302 BAC library that were sequenced as part of the genome project (Supplementary Note 2.1). These clones have a total length of 5586473 base pairs, and include two allelic pairs. (Supplementary Table S17)

To asses the sequence fidelity at the base-pair level, we divided the 33 clones into 5568 non-overlapping fragments of 1000 base pairs (discarding 33 incomplete bins from the ends of the clones), and aligned each to assembly version 1 using BLAT[4]. The total alignment length (matches + mismatches) of the best hits of each 1kb query against the assembly spans 99.0% of the query sequences, with a mismatch frequency of 0.25 %. 26,041 bases (0.47%) of the query sequences were spanned by alignment gaps, and represent insertions in the reference sequence relative to the assembly.

Since assembly 1 represents the two haploid genome copies separately, and each haplome is largely but not entirely complete, some reference sequences have their best alignment to the other haplotype, and consequently these rates of discrepancy include contributions from sequencing and assembly errors as well as from polymorphisms. To estimate the sequencing error rate alone, we considered only those reference sequence bins representing genomic loci assembled from both haplotypes in assembly version 1 (bins with exactly two BLAT alignments to assembly version 1 which span 75% of the length of the bin, and aligning with at least 85% identity). Within the best BLAT alignments of these reference segments, 87% have one or fewer mismatches per aligned 1000 bp (PhredQ >= 30), and the mean mismatch rate is 0.15%.

To assess the accuracy of the assembly at longer length scales, we aligned the full length sequence of each of the same 33 reference sequence clones to assembly version 2. The best alignment of each to the assembly is represented as a dot plot in supplemental figures S30-S62. The alignment of each clone to the assembly spans the entire length of the clone or nearly so. This process detected no apparent global mis-assemblies, indicating fewer than 1 error of this type per 5 Mbp, or fewer than 100 such errors in the whole genome should be expected. The comparisons reveal 52 local sequence stutters in the assembly relative to the finished clones ranging in size from 1 to 10 kb, indicating a frequency of such errors of approximately 1 per 100 Kbp.

2.3 De novo identification of repetitive sequences in the assembly

A set of 562,796 vector-and-quality-trimmed fosmid-end read sequences (roughly ~0.6X coverage) were aligned to the assembly with BLAT[4]. Alignments were filtered to preserve only those which span 90% of the length of the read with at least 85% identity. We collected 11,483 stretches of the genome that were (a) covered throughout by at least 6 reads and (b) contained a region where the local depth of coverage is 16 or greater. These were made non-redundant by assembly with PHRAP (Phil Green, Unpublished) to yield 75 repetitive elements contained within the assembly, ranging from 104 bp to 4,006 bp in length (mean 545 bp). These sequences are contained in Supplementary File sf2.fasta.

2.4 Transposable elements in the amphioxus genome

General description of amphioxus TEs

Transposable elements (TEs) constitute >28% of the amphioxus genome (Supplementary Table S5) and belong to >500 families. In terms of their bulk contribution to the genome size, DNA transposons are twice more abundant than retrotransposons. In the oldest families of amphioxus TEs, copies of fossilized transposons are 19-22% divergent from their consensus sequences (e.g., Harbinger-N5_BF and Harbinger-N15_BF). CR1 non-LTR retrotransposons form the most diverse superfamily of amphioxus TEs, composed of more than 100 families (elements from different families are less than 75% identical to each other). Most non-autonomous non-LTR retrotransposons, also known as SINEs, identified in amphioxus have been retrotransposed by reverse transcriptases and endonucleases encoded by CR1 elements, including SINE2 and SINE3 with their internal pol III promoters derived from tRNA and 5S rRNA, respectively (these SINEs and CR1s share common 3'-terminal portions).

Methods

Transposable elements were identified using WU-BLAST (http://blast.wustl.edu) and its implementation in CENSOR (http://girinst.org/censor/). First, we detected all fragments of the amphioxus genome coding for proteins similar to transposases, reverse transcriptases, and DNA polymerases representing all known superfamilies of TEs. The detected DNA sequences have been clustered based on their pairwise identities using BLASTclust (standalone NCBI BLAST). Each cluster has beet treated as a potential family of TEs described by its consensus sequence. The consensus sequences were built automatically based on multiple alignments of the cluster sequences expanded in both directions and manually modified. Using WU-BLAST/CENSOR we identified fragments of the amphioxus genome similar to the consensus sequences that were considered as copies of TEs. Second, given the identified consensus sequences, we detected automatically insertions longer than 50-bp present in the identified copies of the protein-coding TEs. The insertions have been treated as potential TEs, clustered based on their pairwise DNA identities and replaced by their consensus sequences built for each cluster. After manual refinements of the consensus sequences, the identified families of TEs were classified based on their structural hallmarks, including target site duplications, terminal repeats, encoded proteins and similarities to TEs classified previously. Identified TEs are deposited in Repbase[5].

Supplementary Note 3. Annotation of protein coding genes cDNA libraries for amphioxus were prepared from gastrula and neurula stage embryos, and from larvae as described by [6], and a single library was created for Petromyzon marinus (sea lamprey). Approximately 32,000 expressed sequence tags (ESTs) were attempted from each library. (Supplementary Table S6).

3.1 Expressed sequence tag sequencing.

3.2 Gene prediction, functional annotation and quality control.

The JGI Annotation Pipeline was used for annotation of the amphioxus v1.0 assembly described here. The pipeline includes the following steps: (1) repeat masking, (2) mapping ESTs, full length cDNAs, and putative full length known genes, (3) gene structure prediction using several methods, (4) protein functional annotation using several methods, and (5) combining gene predictions into a non redundant representative set of gene models, which are subject to genome-scale analysis. The genomic sequence, predicted genes and annotations of amphioxus, together with available evidence, are available at the JGI Genome Portal (www.jgi.doe.gov/Amphioxus) and from GenBank under accession number ABEP01000000.

Transposons were masked using RepeatMasker [7] tools and a custom library of manually curated repeats (see above Supplementary Note 2.4). 480,070 ESTs were clustered into 77,402 consensus sequences and both individual ESTs and consensus sequences were mapped onto genome assembly using BLAT[4].

Gene predictors used for annotation of amphioxus v1.0 included ab initio FGENESH [8], homology-based FGENESH+ [8], homology-based GENEWISE [9], and EST-based ESTEXT (Grigoriev, unpublished, available upon request).

A set of 4,272 genes derived from EST clusters with a putative full length open reading frame (ORF) was directly mapped to the genomic sequence to build gene models. FGENESH was trained on this set to achieve sensitivity and specificity of 78% and 78%, respectively on exon prediction. To generate homology-based gene models, proteins from the NCBI NR database were aligned against genomic sequence using BlastX[10]. High quality seed proteins were then used to build models using FGENESH+ and GENEWISE. GENEWISE gene models were then filtered to remove models with frameshifts and internal stop-codons and extended to include start and stop codons where possible. FGENESH, FGENESH+ and GENEWISE gene models were then processed using ESTEXT to correct them according to splicing patterns observed in available ESTs and to extend 3' and 5' UTR of the genes when possible. Annotation summary can be found in Supplementary Table S7A

All gene models were annotated by homology to other proteins from NCBI NR, SwissProt and KEGG databases. Using InterproScan [11] we predicted proteins domains. Using these sources of information, annotation of each protein was mapped to the terms of Gene Ontology [12], KOG clusters of orthologs [13], and KEGG pathways [14].

The large set of all predicted models was reduced to a non-redundant set of 50,818 representative models (Filtered Models), where every (haploid) locus is described by a single best gene model according to the criteria of homology and EST support. For this set of representative gene models we assigned 27,600 peptides (54%) to Gene Ontology (GO) terms [12] , 29,030 peptides (57%) proteins to KOG clusters [13], and 21,060 peptides (41%) to KEGG pathways [14]. Supplementary Table S7B summarizes the functional characterization of the predicted genes.

3.3 Estimation of haploid gene number and identification of allelic pairs of gene models.

Co-linear blocks of highly-similar predicted genes in near-identical order in different locations in assembly version 1 where tabulated using the SEGMENTATOR algorithm, as previously described for identifying conserved gene order between species[15]. The threshold for similarity was a Smith-Waterman alignment p-score < 1e-20, and at most two intervening genes were allowed in constructing colinear segments.

31,813 gene models of the full set of 50,818 predictions participated in a conserved colinear block of a least two "rungs" (i.e. group of putative orthologs with representation on both haplotypes) after discounting tandemly repeated genes with similar sequence. To assess the number of genes represented in each colinear block, for each rung we counted the minimum of the number of genes participating from each haplotype as the number of genes. For example, if a predicted gene on one scaffold of the assembly is part of block of conserved gene order on another scaffold, where it hits two adjacent models, these two models are assumed to be spurious fragmentations of the corresponding allele, and only a single gene is counted. Similarly, if a tandemly repeated gene family shows three copies in one allele, and a greater number of gene models on the other allele, the greater number of models on the other allele is assumed, for counting purposes, to be due to gene modeling artifact.

Counting genes in this way, we compiled a list of gene models which represent 15,123 genes predicted from both alleles by the 31,813 models. This provides an estimate of the over-prediction due to gene fragmentation in the annotation of 5.2%, since 31,813(2 x 15,123) = 1.052. Of the remaining models, which are not confirmed by the occurrence of a similar model in consistent context in two haplotypes, we removed as likely artifacts and/or un-masked repetitive elements 12,173 models which had no identifiable homolog in another sequenced chordate genome. The majority of the gene models excluded by this criterion fall in (sequence-based) clusters of amphioxus gene models with between 30 and 1,244 similar sequences. This is consistent with their being dominated by repetitive elements. (For a description of the method of ortholog identification, see Supplementary Note 7.) The remaining 6,832 gene models represent genes captured from one allele only. Thus the estimated total gene number is 15,123+6,832= 21,955.

Supplementary file sf3.txt correlates gene models with their identified allelic pairs. In some cases, a single model on one haplotype is associated with multiple gene models on the other haplotype, due either to the one gene model being a fusion of genes correctly called as separate genes on the other side, or a single gene being fragmented into multiple genes on the other side.

Supplementary file sf4.txt lists the genes models which have apparent orthologs in other bilaterian genomes, but do not have an identified allelic pair in the annotation.

Supplementary Note 4. Analysis of allelic polymorphisms

Sequence divergence parameters (including Ka, Ks) of allelic gene pairs were estimated by the method of Yang and Nielsen[16,17] (Supplementary Figures 1 and 7). Identified allelic gene pairs were also used as anchors for aligning allelic genomic scaffolds with LAGAN[18].

To estimate the polymorphism rate at neutrally varying sites, we examined a high-confidence set of 3,381 allelic gene pairs (see Supplementary Note 3) which (a) were identified as allelic pairs with very high confidence, being within a strictly co-linear block of at least 10 identified allelic loci and (b) had at least 100 four-fold synonymous positions in the alignment between the two alleles. We found that 77,532 out of 801,442 sites (9.7%) differed between alleles, and that the median synonymous-site divergence between alleles was 9.0%.

To estimate the polymorphism rate of the two haplotypes across the whole genome, we compiled a sample of 100,000 randomly selected stretches of the genome assembly, each 2kb in length and free of any sequence gaps. These sequences were aligned to the entire assembly using BLAT [4] with default settings for nucleotide alignment. 23,041 of these had a best non-self (not overlapping the identical sampled sequence) hit to the assembly that (a) did not span any sequence gaps, and (b) spanned at least 1 kb of the sample query sequence. BLAT reported that alignment of this 46.08 Mb of sequence spanned 43.62 Mbp (Category "A" in Supplementary Figure S2), with 36.47 million matching aligned bases, and 1.41 million mismatches (Category "B"), indicating a genome-wide mean mismatch rate between haplotypes of 3.72%. The aligned sample sequences contained 5.74 Mbp in internal alignment gaps (Categories "C" and "D"). Of this, 2.98 Mb (6.83%) represents sequence not aligning because it has been inserted relative to a shorter sequence on the opposite haplotype, and the mean length of these insertions was 20 bp (Category "C"). The remaining 5.74-2.98=2.76 Mb represents additional unaligned sequence (not spanned by a BLAT pairwise alignment, but internal to the overall alignment of the allelic regions, Category "D"), which could be caused by short, local sequence inversion, not modeled by BLAT. The mean spacing of these indels and small inversions was one every 139 base pairs. In summary, between mismatches (3.72% of homologous nucleotide positions), insertions (6.83% of all nucleotide positions) and inversions or distinct sequence (6.33% of all nucleotide positions), we find that on average only 83.6% of base pairs in one haplotype have a homologous position with the same nucleotide in the other haplotype. If indels and micro-inversions are treated as point differences equivalent to mismatches, the combined rate of variation was 4.0%.

To characterize the variation in polymorphism rate over longer length scales, allelic gene pairs identified as described in Supplementary Note 3 were used as anchors for aligning allelic genomic scaffolds with LAGAN[18]. 1000 paired intergenic sequences, with mean length 100.7 Kb and median length 58 kb, were analyzed for the distribution of single base and indel differences. Supplementary Figures S4, S5, S6, S25, and S26 summarize the distributions of various measures of the sequence divergence observed between these aligned intergenic allelic sequences: number of mismatches in 50bp windows; autocorrelation of haplotype divergence at short short genomic distance; distribution of the lengths of ungapped alignments between haplotypes; size distribution of short indel polymorphisms; size distribution of longer polymorphic indels.

Supplementary Note 5. Deuterostome relationships

Supplementary Table S8 lists the gene set release version numbers used for each genome.

Deuterostome relationships.

Sets of orthologous genes were collected by grouping together mutual-best BLAST[10] hits between Nematostella vectensis (sea anemone) and each other gene set. Individual multiple alignments were created with CLUSTALW[19], manually reviewed, trimmed with Gblocks[20], and concatenated. 364 ortholog sets had representation from all genomes (alignment 1), and 1,090 had up to one missing (alignment 2). The alignments were analyzed by Bayesian and maximum likelihood methods using mrbayes[21,22] and PHYML[23]. Supplementary Note 5 contains more details of the data sources, data compilation and analysis.

Topology constraints

In all analyses of the concatenated protein multiple sequence alignment, we constrained the topology of the trees considered to include only those which respect the following constraints, which represent undisputed phylogenetic relationships: that the two tunicates (Ciona and Oikopleura) be placed together; that the two non-deuterostome out-groups (Nematostella and Drosophila) be placed together; that the five vertebrates be placed together, with topology (Petromyzon , ((Takifugu, Gasterosteus), (Homo, Gallus))).

Maximum likelihood analysis

We ran ProtTest v1.2.6[24] on alignment 1 to select the model of evolution for maximum likelihood analysis, which was carried out with PHYML v2.4.4[23]. The model used was: WAG[25] substitution matrix, 29% invariant sites and gamma-distributed rates with shape parameter 0.76, estimated using four rate categories. For both the identification of the maximum likelihood topology, and for the calculation of bootstrap support values, the likelihoods of all tree topologies satisfying the topological constraints was calculated, with branch length optimization turned on. Bootstrap support values indicate the percentage of 500 bootstrap replicates, constructed with SEQBOOT[17], which resolve the labeled nodes as shown in the maximum likelihood tree.

Bayesian analysis

Bayesian analysis was carried out with MrBayes v3.1.2[21,22] using the WAG substitution matrix, with the fraction of invariant sites and the shape parameter of the rate distribution allowed to vary. Twenty independent runs with random starting trees converged on the same topology and apparently stationary distributions of likelihood and rate parameters within 5000 Monte Carlo iterations. 100% of sampled trees over one million monte carlo iterations after this burn-in period had the topology shown in Figure 1 of the main text. The means of the posterior distributions for the shape parameter and invariant fraction were 0.744 and 0.277 respectively.

Oikopleura dioica gene set creation

707,762 whole genome shotgun reads from the Oikopleura dioica genome project (Seo, 2001 #294) were downloaded from the NCBI Trace Archive on 19 May 2006 and assembled with JAZZ[1] into 88 Mb of scaffold sequence, with N50 scaffold size of 38 Kbp. Human protein sequences from ENSEMBL and Ciona intestinalis sequences from JGI were aligned to the assembled Oikopleura sequence by tblastn, and 8,911 gene models were created with Genomescan[26].

Supplementary Note 6. Intron evolution

Based on mutual-best Smith-Waterman alignment of protein sequences with human genes, a collection of 2,576 orthologous gene sets were constructed with representation from human, stickleback, fugu, chicken, amphioxus, Nematostella, sea urchin, Ciona, and the gastropod Lottia gigantea (see Supplementary Table S8). The starting gene sets were the same as those described in Supplementary Note 5, with the substitution of Lottia gigantea as a representative protostome outgroup in place of Drosophila, which has been shown to be highly derived with respect to intron conservation[27].

Performing ClustalW alignments and identifying high reliability intron splice sites (below) yields 5,337 splice sites for which a 9-way comparison can be made. If the Oikopleura gene models are also included, 1,508 usable splice sites are available for analysis in the 10 species alignment.

"Highly reliable" splice sites are defined as being within a gap free region flanked by fully conserved amino acids and at least 2 amino acids from the edge of such a region. Also, at least 5 of the 10 flanking amino acids on either side of the site should be full conserved or similar as measured by the BLOSUM62 matrix. Finally, no splice site should exist in any species within 4 amino acids from a highly reliable splice site. This last criterion removes seemingly different splice sites that may be due to problems in gene modeling due to ambiguous or cryptic splice sites.

PAUP 4b[28] was used to reconstruct the relationships among the 9 species using both simple parsimony and weighted parsimony in which intron gains were weighted as more costly (by a constant weight factor) than intron losses, for weight factors varying from 2 to 9. All these methods indicated strong support for the same consensus tree topology obtained from the sequence-based phylogeny, with parsimony bootstrap values for monophyletic vertebrates, olfactores and chordates greater than 95%.

We also analyzed the data sets with MrBayes[21,22], using a general binary character model which allows different gain and loss rates (although not different gain and loss rates on different parts of the tree, and therefore does not capture a striking feature of the data, namely the higher rate of intron turnover in the tunicates[27]). Within this model, there is also strong support for vertebrates, olfactores, and chordates, with these groups appearing as monophyletic in more than 99% of topologies sampled in the Bayesian run after apparent equilibrium is reached.

Parsimony analysis (weight=5) on the 1508, 10-species data set (with the highly divergent species Oikopleura included) gives high bootstrap support for monophyletic tunicates and olfactores, and 53% bootstrap support for monophylectic chordates, indicating that the placement of Ciona sister to the vertebrates in the analysis of the larger character matrix is unlikely to be a spurious result to due to long branch attraction.

In all intron analyses, Nematostella and Lottia were constrained to be the outgroups to the other (deuterostome) species, which is important since models of intron evolution in which gain and loss are treated differently were used. If no such constraint is imposed, the effect in both the parsimony and Bayesian analyses is a consensus tree that still shows monophyletic vertebrates, olfactores, and chordates (all with > 99% bootstrap support in unweighted parsimony analysis), but Lottia and sea urchin are brought together with high support (96% in unweighted parsimony analysis).

Supplementary Note 7. Chordate gene families

Two methods were used to approximate the gene complement of the chordate ancestor by clustering genes in modern chordates according to their putative orthology relative to the chordate ancestor. Both methods gave approximately the same reconstruction, indicating that the results are robust to details of methods.

7.1 Chordate gene families reconstructed by c-score clustering

As in [27] we define the "C-value", for BLAST hit between peptides x and y (from genomes X and Y, respectively) as follows:

c(x,y) == b(x,y) / max{b(x,z) for z in Y, or b(w,y) for w in X} where b(x,y) is the BLAST score between x and y.

Note that pairs (x,y) with c(x,y)=1 are mutual best hits (including degenerate cases), and c close to unity generalizes the concept of a mutual best hit. Gene families can be constructed by single link clustering. Supplementary Table S9 shows human-amphioxus clustering by this method; in this calculation, tandem gene families have been collapsed and are represented by the single gene in the tandem cluster with the highest c-score. The number of human-amphioxus clusters was constant at ~8,000 for C >~ 0.7.

7.2 Chordate gene families reconstructed by hierarchical "metazome" clustering

Genes from human, chicken, fugu, stickleback, Ciona, amphioxus, sea urchin, Drosophila and Nematostella (gene sets are listed in Supplementary Table S8) were clustered hierarchically to reconstruct ancestral gene sets for ancestral genomes as previously described in the context of reconstructing the ancestral eumetazoan gene set[27], with the following modification: when forming clusters to represent the genes of a given ancestor, instead of merging clusters based on mutual best hits (MBH) by BLAST of individual genes, we computed mutual best hits between the gene clusters already computed at the next highest nodes of the tree. For example, when considering the merger of tetrapod clusters with bony fish clusters to create ancestral jawed vertebrate clusters, we grouped BLAST hits by cluster, and identified mutual best hit relationships between clusters rather than considering separately the mutual best hits between human-fugu, chicken-stickleback, etc. This prevents "spiraling" due to the non-transitivity of the MBH relationship, in which, for example, a human gene Hs1 has MBH in fugu to Tr1, which has MBH in chicken Gg1, which has MBH in human to a different human gene Hs2, and so on.

By this method we defined 9,975 ancient chordate gene families, and identified gains of novel genes, and losses of ancestral genes on the chordate stem, and on the lineages leading to the major chordate sub-groups. Each family nominally represents the modern descendants of a single gene in the chordate ancestor. These families account for 13,401 human genes, 10,094 chicken genes, 14,286 stickleback genes, 15,766 fugu genes, 7,216 Ciona genes, and 13,610 amphioxus genes (after removing redundant alleles.)

Of the 9,975 gene families, 8,437 have at least one amphioxus member and at least one from Ciona and/or a vertebrate. These are the ancestral chordate gene families discussed in the main text. These correspond roughly to the human-amphioxus clusters with C-value ~ 0.7 in the method described in Supplementary Note 7.1. Of the 9,975 families, 859 appear to have been "lost" in amphioxus (or are missing, poorly predicted, highly divergent, or otherwise incorrectly omitted from the correct gene family) and 679 "lost" in the vertebrate/urochordate ("Olfactores") clade. There are 972 apparent vertebrate gains and 110 apparent olfactores gains.

The 679 apparent olfactores losses were estimated as follows: There are 826 apparent olfactores losses relative to the chordate clusters. 147 of these have amphioxus gene(s) with a c-score > .75 hit to human, suggesting that while not grouped together in the "metazome" clusters they may have orthologs that were missed. This leaves 679 apparent olfactores losses. Again, this set likely contains poor gene predictions and/or highly divergent sequences as well as bona fide losses.

2,427 of the 9,975 families lack Ciona genes. These may represent losses, but also might represent gene families that are present, but not placed in the correct cluster due to the length of the Ciona branch. We searched for possible Ciona members of these gene families as follows: 600 families have a human gene with an e-value < 10^-3 BLAST hit to some Ciona gene, and 1,077 have human or amphioxus with a BLAST hit to a Ciona gene, leaving some 1,350 with no detectable relationship by BLAST to a Ciona gene.

Apparent chordate stem gene losses were identified by identifying clusters that include a sea urchin gene and a Drosophila or Nematostella gene or genes, but lack genes from any of the representative chordate genomes (126 clusters). Only 8 of these clusters are high confidence chordate losses, in the sense outlined above for olfactores losses, and have no BLAST hit with high c-score between a non-chordate cluster member and a chordate gene. These are listed in Supplementary Table S10.

55 gene families appear to have duplicated on the chordate stem (i.e., after the last common deuterostome ancestor, but before the amphioxus-olfactores split) to create 76 new genes in the chordate ancestor.

7.3 Functional categories enriched in amphioxus-specific ancient paralogs

The ontology terms with a significant enrichment among the chordate families which have expande d anciently on the lineage leading to amphioxus are, in order of enrichment factor: Gprotein coupled receptor; Receptor; Ion transport; Transport; Oxidoreductase; Other transporter; Cell surface receptor mediated signal transduction; Transporte r; Extracellular matrix; G-protein mediated signaling; Anion transport; Other metabolism; Oxygenase; Lipid, fatty acid and st eroid metabolism.

The selective forces responsible for these functional enrichments in cephalochordates are unknown .

Supplementary Note 8. Chordate linkage groups

Chromosome segmentation. The human, chicken, and stickleback chromosomes were segmented iteratively by comparison to one another and to the scaffolds of the fugu genome assembly. In each iteration, scaffolds or chromosome segments of genome B are clustered hierarchically, with the Pearson correlation coefficient of the ortholog concentration log-likelihood score on the segments of genome A as the distance metric, and the average pairwise linking method as previously described [27]. Ortholog concentration log-likelihood score is defined to be -log($m\ p$) or zero, whichever is less, where m is the number of pairwise segment comparisons between the genomes in question (i.e. a multiple test correction) and p is the probability of the observed number of shared orthologs relative to the null model that the two segments draw their genes independently from the set of genes in the common ancestor. Breakpoints along the chromosomes and chromosome segments of genome A are then identified as discontinuities in the pattern of how their orthologs fall in genome B, using a hidden Markov model algorithm, described in ([27]). Iteration was repeated until comparison to amphioxus, stickleback, and fugu revealed no further breaks and identified a total of 111 breakpoints along the human genome, which bound 135 segments. These segments are referred to by chromosome name, followed by a period, followed by the number of the segment along the chromosome, e.g. "9.1" indicates the segment at the tip of the p arm of human chromosome 9. When a pair of segments on one human chromosome have syntenic orthologs in chicken, fish and amphioxus genomes, we assume them to have been created by intra-chromosomal inversions in the human lineage, and we treated them as a single merged segment, and denote it with a slash as in "9.1/3". There are a total of 105 merged segments, of which 99 had more than 10 ancestral chordate genes represented on them.

Construction of Chordate Linkage Groups. For whole-genome synteny analysis, orthology between genomes was based on c-score clustering as previously described[27], with c-score threshold of 0.75 when comparing human and amphioxus, and 0.95 when comparing human to other vertebrates. To define initial CLGs (Supplementary Figure 64), human chromosome segments and amphioxus scaffolds were clustered using the same method as for segmentation, and clusters defined by cutting the clustering trees at a correlation threshold of 0.25. Statistical significance of ortholog concentration between regions of one genome and another was computed with Fishers Exact test using the null hypothesis that inferred ancestral genes (ortholog clusters) with representative descendants on the two genome segments are chosen independently. Variation in ortholog cluster size makes these p-values an approximation; to limit the magnitude of this effect, we excluded any ortholog clusters with 25 or more genes. We applied a Bonferroni correction for the total number of pairwise tests.

Additional individually significant conserved synteny after segmentation. As described in the main text, 111 amphioxus scaffolds out of 239 that contain twenty or more orthologs of vertebrate genes has a significant concentration of human orthologs on one or more chromosomes, relative to random expectation ($p<0.05$, multiple test corrected). After dividing the human chromosomes into segments representing ancient blocks of conserved linkage (Methods), this number increases to 145 scaffolds with significant conserved macrosynteny relative to human segments.

Coverage of human genome by segments. The segments of the human genome assigned to a CLG by the clustering method span 3.0 Gbp, or 98% of the euchromatic human genome, and 96% of ENSEMBL human gene predictions. 15,021 of these genes have an assigned amphioxus ortholog by the C-value method with $C>0.75$ (see above), and 12,682 are included in this analysis, the rest falling into large gene families and excluded from this analysis. Of these, 53% have (at least one of) their amphioxus ortholog(s) in a conserved linkage position, (i.e., on a scaffold grouped into the same CLG).

Conserved micro-synteny. Embedded within the 17 ancestral linkage groups are relatively short stretches of conserved gene order (micro-synteny) between amphioxus and human. If we allow at most 10 (or 20) genes to intervene between consecutive pairs of orthologs on the respective genomes, there are 417 (or 1044) human genes that participate in collinear clusters of three or more chordate gene families, compared to 33 (or 154) in a control genome in which gene order in human is scrambled. Thus scrambling of gene order has likely occurred on both the amphioxus and human lineages, and in fact the scrambling of gene order with general preservation of linkage is what allows a single amphioxus scaffold (only a small fraction of a chromosome) to identify conserved linkage with human segments.

Oxford grid methodology. For every scaffold-segment pair, we tabulated the number of predicted ancestral chordate genes with descendants found in both the amphioxus scaffold and human segment. This number of shared orthologous genes was compared to a null model in which the scaffolds and segments have gene content independently drawn from the ancestral set. The "Oxford grid" containted in Supplementary File SF5 in which numbers indicate the number of inferred ancestral chordate genes with orthologous descendants on both the human chromosomal segment (row) and amphioxus scaffold (column). Boxes colored yellow reflect p-value < 0.05, where Bonferroni multiple test correction has been applied as if every pairing in the grid were an independent test (N=45,639). Empty boxes indicate segment-scaffold pairs without orthologs. This grid illustrates not only that there are many scaffold-segment pairs with a highly significant excess of shared ancestral genes, but that the amphioxus scaffolds and human chromosome segments can be grouped into classes, such that scaffold-segment pairs drawn from the same class are likely to have a significant excess of shared ancestral genes.

Reconstruction of teleost proto-chromosomes

We clustered fugu and stickleback genome segments by the same procedure used to reconstruct ancestral chordate chromosomes, with orthology defined as c-score >= 0.75. Supplementary Figure 13 shows that this procedure produces 12 clearly-defined clusters, which we interpret as the 12 chromosomes of the proto-bony fish karyotype, before the teleost-specific genome duplication. Supplementary Table 15 lists the stickleback chromosome segment boundaries.

Reconstruction of bony vertebrate proto-chromosomes

We searched for evidence of fusions between the 69 post-2R vertebrate proto-chromosomes (2rVPCs; Supplementary Table 1) as follows: For each 2rVPC X, we identified inferred ancestral chordate genes (see Supplementary Note 7) which (a) have an amphioxus descendant on a scaffolds grouped into the parent CLG of X, (b) have a human descendant on one of the human chromosome segments assigned to X in Supplementary Table 1, (c) do not have any additional human descendants on paralogous segments. We found 3,486 such diagnostic genes, a mean of 51 diagnostic ancestral chordate genes per 2rVPC. For each pair of 2rVPC X and Y, we then identified those human, chicken and reconstructed ancestral teleost chromosomes which had a significant enrichment (by Fisher's exact test) for genes descended from the diagnostic gene sets of X and Y. Pairs of 2rVPCs which co-occur on one or more chromosomes in each of the human, chicken and reconstructed ancestral teleost genomes are likely already to have been merged in the last common ancestor of the bony vertebrates. For 6 2rVPCs (11c, 12c, 14a, 15a, 17c, and 1b), no significant concentration of diagnostic genes was found on any chicken chromosome. For pairs involving these 2rVPCs, co-occurrence on a human chromosome and a fish proto-chromosome was interpreted to imply a fusion before the bony vertebrate common ancestor. 39 of the 69 2rVPCs participate in such an implied merger of segments after 2R and prior to the bony vertebrate LCA, including ancient pairings of this kind, including 13 pair-wise and 6 three-way groupings (Supplementary Table 11). Several 2rVPCs participate in more than one ancient pairing, which could indicate fissions of these segmentts between 2R and the bony vertebrate LCA. 12 2rVPCs could not be tested due to a lack of a significant hit to any teleost or human chromosome, and could therefore not be evaluated by this criteria. We estimate therefore that the ancestral bony vertebrate had between 37 (if none of the 12 untested segments was it's own chromosome in the bony vertebrate LCA) and 49 chromosomes (if they all were).

Identification of fusions on the amniote stem

Diagnostic collections of ancestral chordate genes were created for each of the bony vertebrate LCA chromosomes by merging the diagnostic clusters of their constituent 2rVPCs. In these cases where one 2rVPC appears to have undergone fission, and participates in two independent bony vertebrate LCA chromosomes, the diagnostic set was subdivided accordingly. For example, 2rVPC 5d occurs with 5a on human chromosome X and chicken chromosome 1, and also with 4d on human 1 and chicken 23. The diagnostic genes with ortholgos on human X or chicken 1 were combined with the diagnostic genes of 5a form one new set of diagnostic genes, while those with orthologs on human 1 or chicken 23 were grouped with those of 4d. Pairs of these diagnostic sets were then compared to the human and chicken chromosomes, to identify the 4 apparent mergers, and one apparent fission, of bony vertebrate LCA chromosomes on the amniote lineage. (Supplementary Table 12).

Fluorescent in situ hybridization (FISH). Chromosome preparation was performed as previously described[29] and modified as follows.

To obtain metaphase plates with non-overlapping chromosomes, after an initial treatment with 0.02% colchicine (Sigma) in sea water (25 minutes), embryos were transferred to a 1.5-ml microfuge tube and treated with hypotonic mixtures (seawater and 0.075M KCl in ratios 2:1 and 1:1 for 5 min each). Two color FISH was carried out as previously described[30] with a modified hybridization solution. The hybridization mix consisted of 50% formamide, 2xSSC, 10% dextran sulfate, 0.1µg/µl sheared B. floridae adult DNA, 0.15% SDS. The DIG and biotin-labeled probes were added to the hybridization mix at a final concentration of 2-10ng/µl. (See Supplementary Table S2 and Supplementary Figure S8)

Supplementary Note 9. Timing of whole genome duplications

9.1 Phylogenetic analysis

We applied a common protocol to ORFs derived from lamprey ESTs and peptides from Ciona and Fugu genes:

1. For each of 1,093 ancient chordate clusters with paralogs arising from the 2R event or events, take one amphioxus gene (ignoring the other allele, and/or amphioxus specific gene duplicates) and one pair of human genes on distinct chromosomal segments that are apparently paralogous based on earlier analysis. (If the family has three or more paralogs, other genes are not considered further.)
2. Add a lamprey, Ciona, or Fugu gene "X" to one of these clusters if it's best BLAST hit among human genes is in that cluster. If more than one lamprey/ciona/fugu gene satisfies this condition for the same cluster, add only the one with the best score. This procedure forms sets of quartets (Bf,Hs1,Hs2,X).
3. For each quartet, create a multiple alignment with Clustalw[19], trim the alignment with stringent options in Gblocks[20].
4. Evaluate the likelihoods of the three unrooted tree topologies for this tree with PHYLIP[17]. If one topology has maximum likelihood in >50% of 500 bootstrap replicates with PHYLIP, it is considered resolved.

If the two rounds of whole genome duplication occurred before the divergence of a given lineage, then we would expect that a gene X from a family that duplicated on the vertebrate stem would more often be closely associated with a specific jawed-vertebrate gene in a family of ohnologs, and so would be related to their closest human (Hs1, Hs2) and amphioxus (Bf) homologs according to the nested relationship ((Hs1, X), Hs2), Bf). If, on the other hand, large-scale duplication occurred both before and after the divergence of a given lineage, then we would expect at least 33% of individual genes to be related to pairs of human genes according to (((Hs1, Hs2), X), Bf) (Supplementary Figure S11).

Results are summarized in Supplementary Table 1 of the main text.

9.2 Elephant shark conserved synteny and 2R.

Analysis of the draft sequence of cartilaginous fish Callorhynchus millii (the elephant shark) has provided evidence that both rounds of genome duplication affecting bony vertebrates preceded the divergence of bony and cartilaginous fish[31]. We used the whole genome data of that study to compare gene linkage in elephant shark with our reconstructed chordate linkage groups and 2R paralogy groups. By BlastP, we compared 1,731,890 shotgun reads to the human proteome, and identified 2,096 fosmid clones whose end sequences have distinct unique homolog (i.e., no other hits with > 65% of the best score) in the human gene set. These genes are ~35-40 kb apart in the shark genome.

If ancestral synteny relationships in the shark genome have not been lost through genomic rearrangements (as they nearly have all been in Ciona), and if 2R preceded the cartilaginous/bony split, then we expect that the shark gene pairs would be found predominantly in the same ancestral chordate linkage groups, and also within the same paralogy group (i.e. the same row and column of Table 1 of the main text). If, on the other hand, one or both rounds of genome duplication were specific to the bony vertebrates and had not been shared with cartilaginous fish, then duplication and intervening loss after the split with shark would lead to an excess of clones between different paralogous segments derived from the same chordate linkage group. 1,123 clones (54%) hit different genes belonging to the same chordate linkage group. Of these 980 (87%) hit two genes in the same paralogy group within a given CLG. It is most parsimonious to conclude that both rounds of genome duplication preceded the divergence of bony vertebrates and sharks. (The alternate hypothesis of a bony-vertebrate-specific genome duplication would require highly correlated reciprocal gene loss across the entire genome.)

Supplementary Note 10. Conserved non-coding sequences

10.1 Computational detection of conserved non-coding sequences.

Whole genome alignments of the Amphioxus genome version 1 scaffold sequences and Human genome reference sequence (NCBI v35) were performed using the VISTA pipeline infrastructure [32], based on efficient combination of global and local alignment methods. First, we obtained a map of large blocks of conserved synteny between the two species by applying Shuffle-LAGAN glocal chaining algorithm[18] to local alignments produced by translated BLAT[4]. Then, in each syntenic block we apply Shuffle-LAGAN a second time to obtain a more fine-grained map of small-scale rearrangements such as inversions. After that, VISTA with a similarity cut-off of 60% identity over 50bp was used to identify candidate conserved non-coding sequences.

The human genome coordinates of all alignments were used in the UCSC table browser to identify and remove: (i) elements overlapping known genes, human mRNAs, spliced ESTs, Ensembl genes, human repeats, simple repeats, retroposed genes, and high copy number regions in the human genome (defined by more than one overlapping self-chain hit); (ii) elements not overlapping the "most conserved" track in the UCSC genome browser; (iii) elements not conserved between human and at least one of the fish, chicken, or frog genomes. The amphioxus genome coordinates of all remaining alignments were used to exclude elements with BLASTX alignments to proteins encoded by the amphioxus genome (Supplementary Table S11).

Supplementary Note 11. NK quadruple conserved synteny.

In addition to the genome-wide synteny analysis, a detailed analysis was carried out on four version 1 scaffolds that make up the NK homeobox cluster in amphioxus[33]. To ensure accuracy, phylogenetic reconstruction, rather than BLAST, was used to assign orthology and detect gene duplication. Phylogenetic analysis was carried out for 122 amphioxus Filtered Models from version 1 scaffolds 56, 124, 185, and 294 which showed strong evidence for being real genes (based only upon EST matches and/or BLAST score and not upon prior data from previous BAC analysis) and which had BLAST matches to known genes in a range of invertebrates and vertebrates including humans. Trees with support values less than 50% at key nodes were discarded. Amphioxus-specific duplicates, or identical amphioxus genes (which may have been due to assembly errors) were counted only once per family. The locations of human orthologs resulting from duplications at the base of the vertebrate lineage were determined for the remaining 82 gene families. The 82 amphioxus genes correspond to 111 human genes, indicating that amphioxus genes typically have a single ortholog in humans. The observed chromosomal distribution of these human genes was significantly different from the expected distribution calculated from the total number of "known genes" on each human chromosome (Chi-squared test $p<0.001$). A histogram (Supplementary Figure 7) showing the number of orthologs on each human chromosome, scaled by the total number of genes on that chromosome, revealed peaks on human chromosomes 4, 5, 8 and 10, in agreement with the genome-wide analysis of CLG #7.

(B) Human paralogs on the same chromosomal segment (pink) are highly enriched for recent gene duplications, and have few ancient duplications, as measured by four-fold synonymous transversions. Conversely, paralogs lying on different segments (blue) are enriched for ancient gene duplications (4DTv ~0.42). Paralogous gene pairs joining different segments from the same reconstructed chordate linkage group (green) are overwhelmingly from ancient duplications.

Below ~80% identity, or 10 mismatches per 50 bp window (98% of the 380,000 sampled windows) the distribution matches a geometric distribution with mean of 1.6 mismatches per window (i.e., 96.2% identity). Figure S7. Ka/Ks distribution for amphioxus alleles, human-chimp and human-mouse orthologs. The distribution of Ka/Ks for amphioxus allelic pairs, along with that of human-chimpanzee and human-mouse ortholog pairs. Ka/Ks was estimated by the method of Yang and Nielsen[16] via the PHYLIP package[17] based on full-length pairwise alignments of protein sequence in each case, but the genes used were restricted to those with at least 100 amino acid positions after a 4-species multiple sequence alignment was trimmed with Gblocks.

For the 17 CLGs, the distribution of the number of independent chromosomal segments in the jawed-vertebrate common ancestor as inferred by multi-species synteny conservation alone (blue), distribution of ohnologs alone (green), and the combined analysis (red). The distribution of the number of independent chromosomal segments descended from each CLG at the time of the fish-tetrapod split as inferred by parsimony using multi-species synteny and gene duplicates separately, and in a combined analysis (Methods). Because the multi-species synteny analysis relies heavily on comparison to ray-finned fish chromosomes, which appear to have undergone substantial scrambling of gene order within chromosomes, the estimated number of inferred ancestral jawed vertebrate segments per CLG is expected to be a lower bound. In contrast, we expect the number of independent segments inferred by gene duplicates alone to be inflated due to small chromosome segments with too few ancient duplicates to be constrained with statistical significance. When combined, however, these complementary signals reveal a striking dominance of quadruple conserved synteny over other multiplicities.

Each color is followed by a list of the conservation profiles that it is used to represent. Each conservation profile consists of a string of four characters. The four positions in each string refer to conservation in the stickleback, pufferfish, amphioxus and Nematostella vectensis genomes respectively. A "1" at a particular position indicates that two segments of the human genome co-occur in the same chromosome, or cluster of scaffolds in the corresponding genome with high statistical significance. A "0" indicates that the two segments each have a significant hit in the corresponding genome, but that the hits do not coincide. A "?" indicates that one or more of the segments lacks any significant conserved synteny in the other genome.

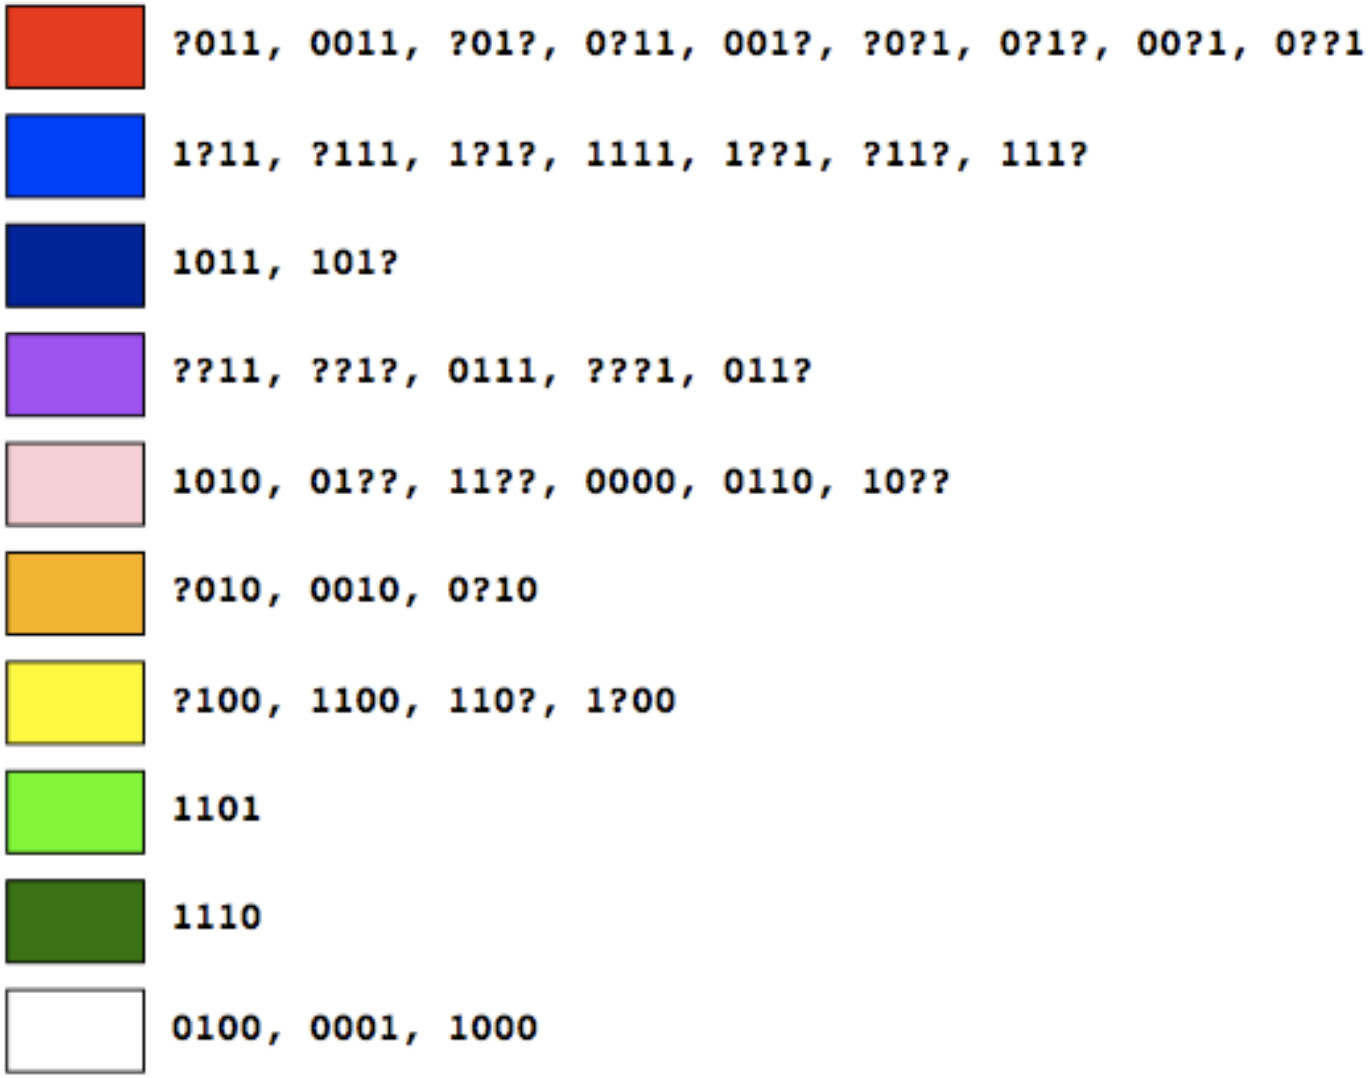

Figure S18. All-to-all comparison of human genome segments. Rows and columns represent the segments of the human genome, derived as described in the text. The color at the intersections of rows and columns indicate whether the segments are not related by conserved synteny (white), show conserved synteny to the same regions of fish, amphioxus and Nematostella genomes (blue), show conserved synteny to two distinct regions in fish genomes, but the same regions of amphioxus and Nematostella genomes (red). Orange indicates that only amphioxus places the segments together, indicating either a chromosomal fusion on the amphioxus lineage, or a vertebrate stem divergence, but without statistically-significant confirmation in Nematostella. Circles indicate the number of ohnolog pairs relating two segments, with area proportional to observed number divided by the expected number under a random model, given the number of genes on each segment. The inscribed circle provides a visual indication of the uncertainty in the estimate, by showing the size that the circle would take for N - sqrt(N) ohnologs. Circles marked with an "X" have a significant ($p<0.05$) excess of ohnologs relative to the expectation of the random model.

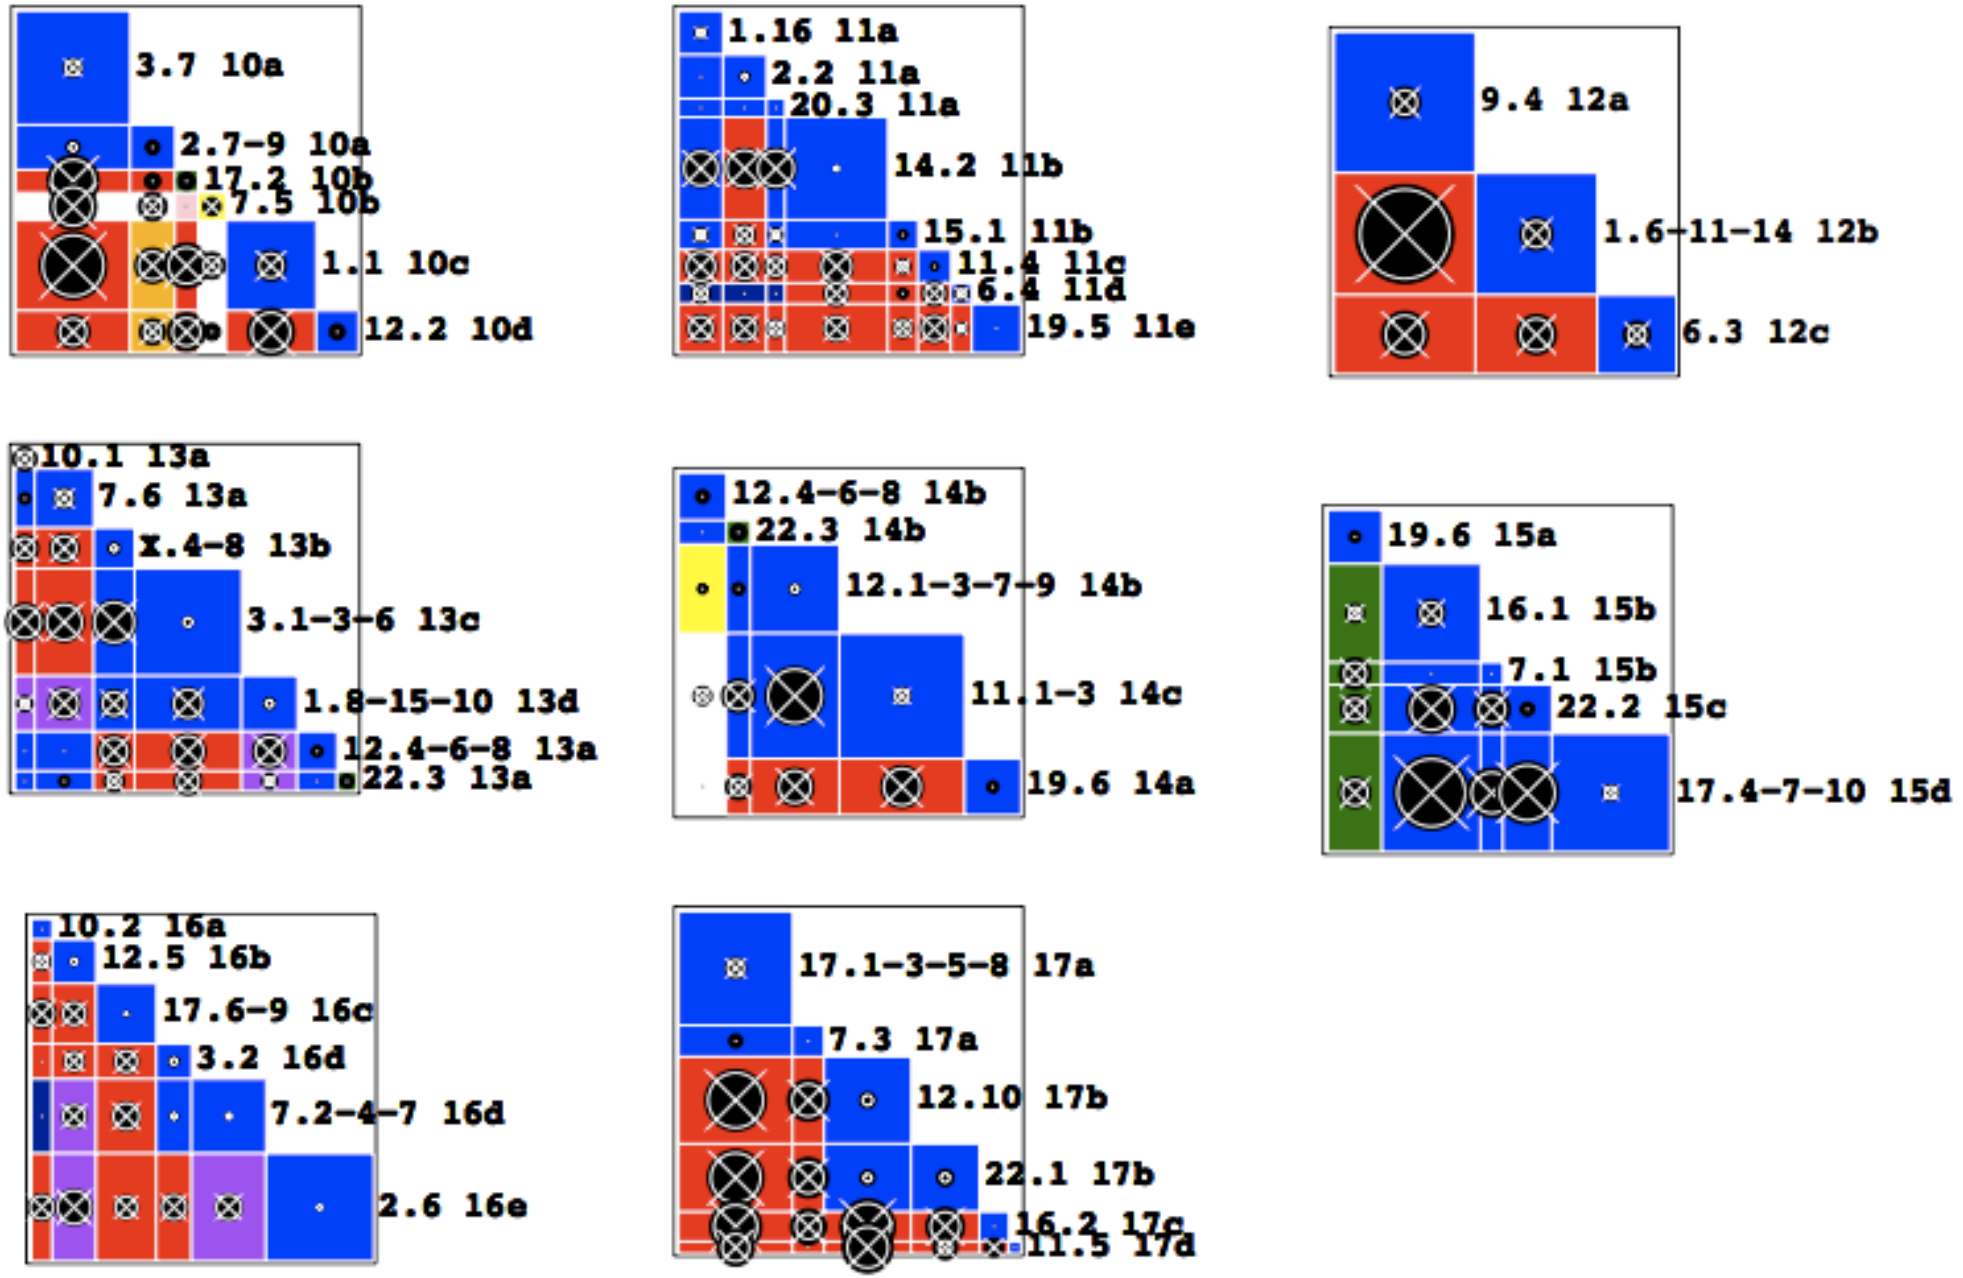

Figure S21. Lineage X divergence relative to 2R predicts gene tree topology statistics. For the three possible positions of the divergence of a linage "X" relative to two rounds of gene duplication, the figure illustrates the resulting gene tree topology (top row of trees), and lists the predicted ratio of three-gene trees, including oneortholog in X, and two randomly selected genes from the set of paralogs created by the duplications (upper row of ratios and percentages). The bottom row of trees and the lower row of rations shows the impact on the predicted tree statistics of the loss of one of theparalogs created by the first round of gene duplication, as is expected for many individual genes following whole genome duplication.

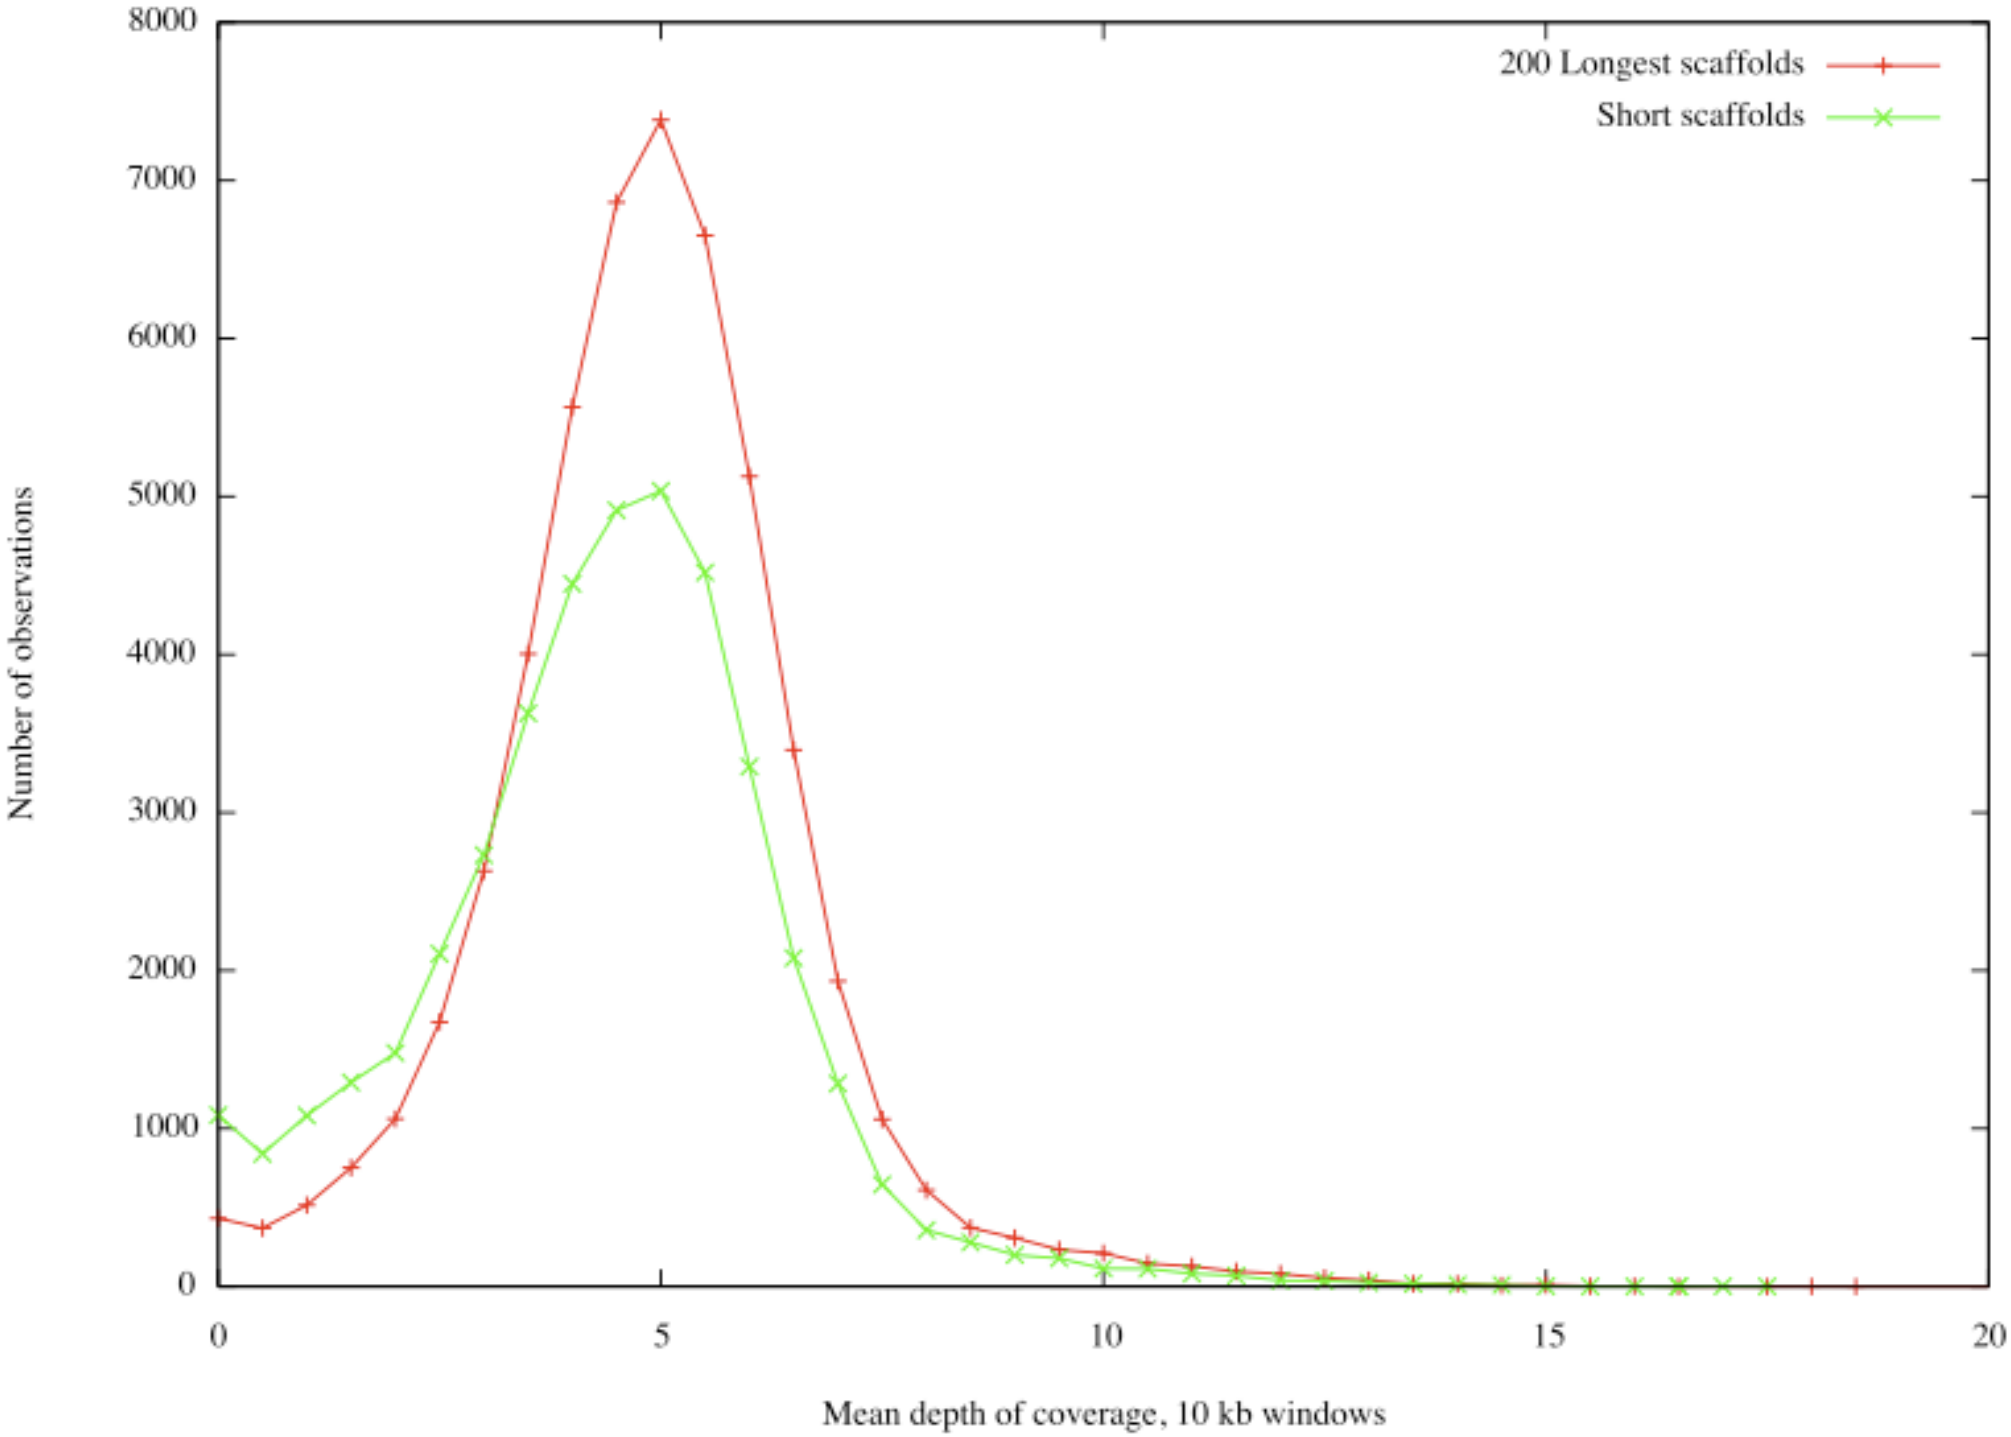

Figure S24. Number of overlapping reads for all (green) and WGS-unplaced (red) reads. All against all read-read alignments were performed as part of the JAZZ assembly process as described in [1]. A peak at 2d overlaps per read is expected for a random distribution of shotgun reads and depth d. For all reads (green), the peak occurs at ~11-12 overlaps/read, consistent with ~5.7X depth per haplotype. Reads that are unplaced in the assembly (red) are enriched for low overlap per read.

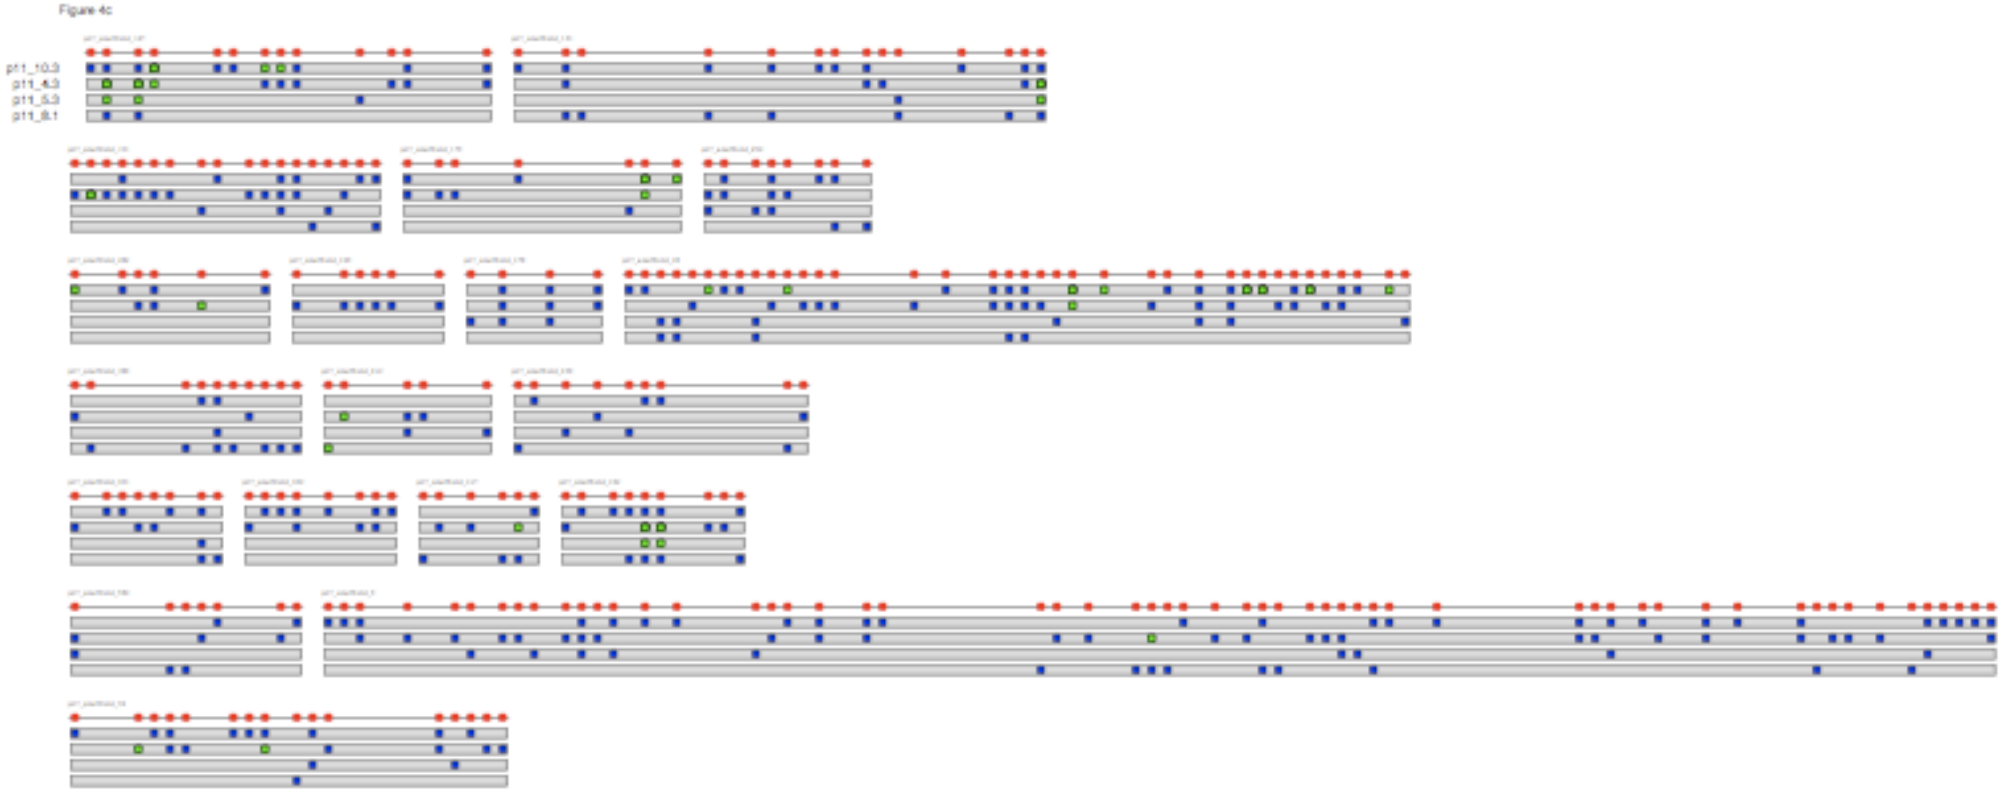

Figure S28. Mapping human genome segment divergences to the vertebrate stem. fish, indicating duplication on the Middle panel shows case of two distinct pairs of teleost fish-tetrapod chromosomal segments that arose by duplication from a single ancestral segment on the jawed vertebrate stem. In this case, each human segment (white and black) have a corresponding distinct segment in teleost fish, but both show conserved synteny to the same amphioxus and sea anemone scaffolds. The panel to the left shows two tetrapod segments that show conserved synteny to the same segments of teleosttetrapod stem. The panel to the right shows the case of a chromosomal fusion on the amphioxus lineage, which mimics the syntenic relationships between amphioxus, tetrapods, and teleost fish that are found in the middle panel. Unlike the middle panel, however, the sea anemone outgroup shows that these segments fused in amphioxus.

Blue arrows represent scaffolds of assembly version 1, labeled by scaffold number, and showing hashes representing sequence gaps. Allelic "stutter" mis-assemblies (see Supplementary Note) have been excised, and are labeled with the source version 1 scaffold number followed by an asterisk, followed by the index number of the deletion (e.g. 30*2 denotes the second excised sequence from scaffold 30). A scaffold number followed by a colon indicates that a version 1 scaffold has been broken, and the number following the colon indicates the index number of the fragment shown. Colored lines represent individual MegaBLAST alignment segments, color coded by percent identity. The segments of the version 1 scaffolds which are tiled together to produce each version 2 scaffold are highlighted in yellow.

Dots represent the relative position of orthologous gene pairs in human chromosomal segments (vertical position) and the 196 largest amphioxus version 2 scaffolds (horizontal position), in increasing index (i.e., gene number) along the chromosome/scaffold. Amphioxus scaffolds and human chromosomal segments have been ordered to show 17 clusters of human chromosomal segments and amphioxus scaffolds determined by hierarchical clustering. Alternating bars along the right and lower edges indicate the extent of individual segments and scaffolds respectively. The orthology relationships represented by red and yellow lines in (A) are shown as read and yellow dots, and their locations are hilighted with colored circles. More detailed views can be found in Supplementary Figure 29, which shows a detailed view of the 17 th CLG, and in Supplementary File 5, which contains an Oxford grid tabulating the number of orthologs for each scaffold-segment pair.

Ancient Developmental Gene Linkages: Otx and goosecoid are immediate neighbors (5 kb apart; scaffold 25), as are Mnx and ro (17 kb apart; scaffold 205), Nkx2-1 and Nkx2-2 (50 kb; scaffold 245), and Nkx7 with Nkx6 (scaffold 36, separated from the previously reported Lbx/Tlx gene pair by just two intervening genes). In addition, there is a cluster of four homeobox genes comprising En and Dll, with tandem duplicates of CG13424 (Nedxa and Nedxb) between them, in total spanning 130 kb (scaffold 9).

"short" have vector sequence detected at the 3' end of a sequencing read, indicating that the cloned sequence is less than ~650 bp.
"insertless" have less than 150 bp of high quality, non-vector sequence.
"contaminant" are those ESTs which align to E. coli, or to mitochondrial or ribosomal sequence of the target organism.

Supplementary Table S18

Enriched functional categories. The ten most significantly enriched PANTHER functional categories [87] in chordate gene families with retained 2R duplicates (Methods). Significance of the enrichment is measured relative to the null hypothesis that retention in multiple copies occurs at random, independent of gene function. For example, 9% of chordate gene families have an annotation that implicates them in "signal transduction", the most significantly enriched ontology term; of these, 38% were retained in multiple copies after 2R by the more stringent criteria, requiring paralogous pairs in conserved syntenic position (more than twice the overall retention rate of 18%). All are significant at the level of p < 1e-15.

Number chordate gene families	Number of chordate families with retained duplicates (synteny-confirmed based on 2R reconstruction)	% chordate families with retained duplicates (with synteny)	PANTHER Functional annotation category
